PREFACE

THE harnessing of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, by the hitherto commonly adopted method of adjusting and grouping the decisions of Courts in this country and in England under the relative sections, commendable in many respects, did not in my experience lend sufficient assistance to the conveyancer, and business lawyer not finding his difficulties solved.

Hence I have broken the tradition of conventional commentators. This work was undertaken by me many years ago at the suggestion of my father, a leading lawyer in the Central Provinces and Author of the C. P. Digest. The accomplishment of this task took several years as there were many pauses. My idea was not merely to deal with the sections and the principles established by authoritative decisions but to lay before practitioners and their clerks a book dealing with the solution of problems arising at the desk and in Court and also indicating to them how to proceed in drafting and disentangling vexed questions on conveyancing. To the task I have brought my experience as a very busy solicitor for over 25 years during which I have perused more than 12,000 deeds and instruments, not to speak of the several suits and summons relating to title attended to by me in the course of my practice.

The special features of this essentially practical work, besides a full discussion of the English and Indian Case Law, are :—

- (a) An easily read summary of the Act.
- (b) Changes made by the Transfer of Property Amendment Act, 20 of 1929.
- (c) Pitfalls to which a conveyancer is exposed.
- (d) Information on matters not usually connected with a book dealing with authoritative case law such as a stock mortgage, power-of-attorney income-tax payable by a mortgagor, broker's position in the transaction, conditions on a sale by auction, transfers by limited holders, remedies of vendor and purchaser on breach, etc., etc.

- (e) Hints on drafting and the various stages through which a draftsman has to pass in the preparation of a conveyance, mortgage, lease, licence for transferring a leasehold property, creation of a charge, assignment of a chose in action, or of a policy of insurance, instruments of gift and exchange.
- (f) Requisitions on title.
- (g) Parallel references of old English cases from the English Reports.
- (h) Table of Cases with reference to alphabetical footnotes.
- (i) A copious and exhaustive index with cross references.

Quotations of decisions and dicta have been avoided to limit bulk, save where found necessary for the mofussil lawyer who has not at his disposal a large library. All the decisions down to the end of 1937 are incorporated.

For reading the proofs I am indebted to Mr. J. S. C. Davar of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law, and Mr. P. P. Khambatta, Advocate (O.S.), and I take this opportunity of thanking them for the care and industry with which they have done their work.

| | Chapter VIII substituted | 2 of 1900, s. 4. |
| | Repealed as to Crown Grants | 15 of 1895, s. 2. |

Various stages of the Act.—It is not within the province of a Court to look to the Statement of Objects and Reasons or to the proceedings of the Legislative Council with a view to discover whether the words used mean something above and beyond what they say (a). It is not permissible to refer, for this purpose, to the various forms in which the Bill was brought before the Legislature (b) or the Report of the Select Committee (c). The sense is not to be collected from history of changes or debate on the Bill (d).

Report of the Commissioners.—The Report of the Commissioners on which a statute is founded is no aid in its construction (e). The Indian decisions to the contrary are doubtful (f).

Reasons for enactment.—The Transfer of Property Act was brought upon the Indian Statute-book because it was expedient to define and amend certain parts of the law relating to the transfer of property by act of parties (g). It does not consolidate the pre-existing law but only lays down certain portions of it in derogation of the rest. Hence it is not a complete code in itself as regards the subject it deals with.

Transfers within the Act.—The Act applies to alienations inter vivos and has no application to transfers by operation of law or disposal of property by will (h).

Title of the Act.—This is no part of the law and in strictness ought not to be taken into consideration (i) but it may tend to shew the object of the Legislature (j) nor should any weight be attached as to its scope (k) or to alter its construction (l).

The preamble.—The preamble is merely a key to the construction of a statute and the mischief it was intended to remedy (m). It is undoubtedly a part of the Act and may be used to explain it. It cannot control the enacting part which may and often does go beyond it (n).

It may well point out what is the subject-matter in respect of which the Act is intended to operate and does operate (o) and where the enacting part of a statute

Pream. is ambiguous, the preamble can be referred to, to explain and elucidate it (p). In Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. (q), Lord Halsbury said: "Two propositions are quite clear: one, that a preamble may afford useful light as to what a statute intends to reach, and another that if an enactment is itself clear and unambiguous, no preamble can qualify or cut down the enactment." If the words of the Act are clear and unambiguous you cannot alter its construction by reason of the preamble (r).

Though the preamble does not control any plain enactment which follows it, it may be a most useful guide when a question of doubt arises upon the construction of a particular provision and considerations relating to the scope of the Act are involved (s). A preamble does not govern clear expressions in the enacting part (t).

Section.—Where an Act is divided into sections and rules the proper canon of interpretation is that the sections lay down general principles and the rules provide the means by which they are to be applied, and they cannot be otherwise applied (u). There is no magic in the word section or in the different parts of an Act being numbered (v). If there be two inconsistent enactments it must be seen if one cannot be read as a qualification of the other (w).

If two sections are repugnant, the last must prevail (x).

Proviso.—A proviso appended to a section is either an explanation or a qualification of the section. It does not add to or enlarge the scope of the section (y). It is engrafted on a preceding enactment (z).

Marginal notes.—Marginal notes to sections of an Act do not form part of the Act (a) nor do they control the enactment (b).

No reliance can be placed on them for the purpose of interpreting the section (c). They can be referred to for the purpose of interpretation if they can be regarded as inserted by, or under the authority of, or assented to by the Legislature or can be looked at to see the general trend of the section (d).

Illustrations.—These are no part of the section but they are helpful in the working and application of the statute and their usefulness in that respect should not be impaired. They should only be rejected as repugnant to the section as the last resort of construction (e).

Pream.

It is the duty of the Court to accept, if that can be done, illustrations given under the section as being of value in the construction of the text. It would require a special case to warrant their rejection on the ground of repugnancy with the section (f). The Act is not affected by it inasmuch as an illustration has not the same operation as the section which really forms the enactment (g). They do not control the plain meaning of the words (h).

Heading of parts.—Headings are not to be treated as marginal notes. They constitute an important part of the Act itself. They may be read as affording a better key to the construction of the sections which follow (i) or to determine the sense of any doubtful expression in a section ranged under any particular heading (j). They cannot be allowed to control the enactment (k) or cut down the effect of plain words in the sections (l).

The Schedules.—The Schedule is as much a part of the Act as the enactment (m). If the enacting part and the Schedule do not correspond the latter must give way (n).

Punctuation and brackets.—This is not a part of the Act. There are no such things as brackets any more than there are such things as stops (o).

Their Lordships of the Privy Council regard it an error to rely on punctuation in construing Acts of the Legislature (p).

Interpretation clause.—The interpretation clause is of modern origin and frequently does a great deal of harm (q). It is not of a descriptive but of an enlarging character and should be used for the purpose of interpreting the words which are ambiguous or equivocal and not so as to disturb the meaning of such as are plain (r).

Act, if exhaustive.—The essence of a code is to be exhaustive in the matters in respect of which it declares the law, and it is not the province of a Judge to disregard or go outside the letter of the enactment, according to its true construction (s).

Pream.

The Transfer of Property Act was not intended to be exhaustive and does not profess to be a complete code (t). It does not exclude any equitable principle such as may regulate the rights and liabilities of the parties in a case not specifically provided by the Legislature (u).

It was said by Lord Hobhouse in Waghela v. Shekh Masludin (v) that the expression "equity and good conscience" was generally interpreted as meaning English Law, if found applicable to Indian society and circumstances. But in matters regulated thereby the Act is to be regarded as exhaustive (w).

Amending Act, retrospective effect of.—Since the passing of the Transfer of Property Act in 1882 its provisions have been amended on twelve occasions. But there was no general revision of the Act nor was there any importation of a new principle until the Amending Act 20 of 1929 was passed whereby substantial changes have been made in the Act which have been noticed in their proper places. Of the Amending Act section 63 is in these terms:—

"Nothing in any of the following provisions of this Act, namely, sections 3, 4, 9, 10, 15, 18, 19, 27, 30 clause (c) of section 31, sections 32, 33, 34, 35, 46, 52, 55, 57, 58, 59, 61 and 62 shall be deemed in any way to affect—

- (a) the terms or incidents of any transfer of property made or effected before the first day of April 1930,
- (b) the validity, invalidity, effect or consequences of anything already done or suffered before the aforesaid date,
- (c) any right, title, obligation or liability already acquired, accrued or incurred before such date, or
- (d) any remedy or proceeding in respect of such right, title, obligation or liability; and nothing in any other provision of this Act shall render invalid or in any way affect anything already done before the first day of April 1930, in any proceeding pending in a Court on that day; and any such remedy and any such proceeding as is herein referred to may be enforced, instituted or continued, as the case may be, as if this Act had not been passed."

To ascertain how far the Amending Act is retrospective, the following rules are deducible from the authorities:—

1. The initial presumption is that an Act is not retrospective. The Court will not ascribe retrospective force to new laws affecting rights unless by express words or necessary implication it appears that such was the intention of the Legislature (x). Provisions which if applied retrospectively would deprive of their

PRELIMINARY.

Short title.

1. This Act may be called the Transfer of Property Act, 1882.

Commencement.

It shall come into force on the First day of July 1882.

Extent.

It extends in the first instance to the whole of British India except the territories respectively administered by the Governor of Bombay in Council, the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab and the Chief Commissioner of British Burma.

But any of the said Local Governments may from time to time by notification in the local official Gazette, extend this Act or any part thereof to the whole or any specified part of the territories under its administration.

And any Local Government may, from time to time, by notification in the local official Gazette, exempt, either retrospectively or prospectively, any part of the territories administered by such Local Government from all or any of the following provisions, namely :—

Sections 54, paragraphs 2 and 3, 59, 107 and 123.

Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing part of this section, sections 54, paragraphs 2 and 3, 50, 107 and 123 shall not extend or be extended to any district or tract of country for the time being excluded from the operation of the Indian Registration Act, 1908, under the power conferred by the first section of that Act or otherwise.

Changes in the section.—The only change made by the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, 20 of 1929, is to substitute for the year " 1877 " the year of the Registration Act now in force, namely, " 1908."

Short title.—The Act deals with transfers inter vivos only.

Commencement.—The Act came into force on the 1st day of July 1882 on which date it was made to extend to the whole of British India except the territories administered by the Governors of Bombay, the Punjab and British Burma.

Extent.—The Act itself purports to apply to the whole of British India except the territories specified therein. It includes the Scheduled Districts as the Scheduled Districts Act, 1874, does not apply to Acts of the Indian Legislature passed after that Act (f). British India is defined by section 3 (7) of the General Clauses Act, X of 1897, a later statute which in section 3 enacts that the definitions therein are for Acts and Regulations made after the commencement of that Act. British India includes the agency tract of Vizagapatam District (g). The application of this Act was barred in the Naga Hills District, including the Mokokechang Sub-division, the Dibrugarh Frontier Tract, the North Cachar Hills, the Garo Hills, the Khasia and Jaintia Hills, and the Mikir Hills Tract, by notification under s. 2 of the Assam Frontier Tracts Regulation, 1880 (2 of 1880) (h). It does not extend to Native States save in certain States where it has been enacted as a Regulation, the word "Act" being substituted by the word "Regulation."

Rajkot (i), Wadhwan (j), Kathiawar (k), Secunderabad (l) are not British Indian territory nor are lands occupied by an Indian Independent State Railway (m).

Other references.—The Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab is now Governor of the Punjab. British Burma is now Lower Burma (n). The Chief Commissioner of British Burma is now Governor of Burma.

Bombay.—Act IV of 1882 has been extended with effect from 1st January 1893, to the whole of the territories other than the Scheduled Districts, under the administration of the Government of Bombay (o).

Sind.—The whole Act has been extended with effect from 1st January 1915, to the province of Sind (p).

Berars.—The Act was extended to Berars in 1907 (q). Prior to 1907 the principles embodied in the Act were applied as principles of equity and good conscience. It is foreign territory (q¹).

Burma.—The whole Act has been extended with effect from 22nd December 1924 to the whole of Burma except certain specified areas (r).

Bangalore.—The Civil and Military Station of Bangalore is an area in the Mysore State. A notification made under the Indian Foreign Jurisdiction Order, 1902, has declared that the Act shall apply in the station so far as applicable thereto (s).

Mysore.—Enacted as Regulation IV of 1918 it has been extended to the whole of Mysore. It received the assent of His Highness the Maharaja on the 14th day of March 1918 (t).

Secunderabad and Aurangabad.—Only section 108 (f) is made applicable (u). The whole of it is now extended by notification No. 418 of the Foreign Department dated 2nd August 1932. The Hyderabad State Transfer of Property Act is on the same lines as the Act with slight modification to suit local conditions. It came into force on 5th April 1928.

S. 1 Other Cantonments.—The Act has been applied to Mhow, Neemuch and Nowgong and the Indore Residency Bazars, being administered areas in Central India (v).

The Punjab.—In the Punjab the principles of the Act apply but it is necessary to shew that a principle has been transgressed as opposed to the non-observance of prescribed formalities (w).

Although the equitable principles underlying the Act are followed, the Act itself with its technicalities does not apply (x).

Delhi.—In the absence of any notification under section 1 of the Transfer of Property Act extending that Act to Delhi the mere fact that Delhi ceased to be a part of the Punjab did not automatically bring the Act into operation in Delhi (y).

Madras.—The Act has been repealed or modified to the extent necessary to give effect to the provisions of Madras Act 3 of 1922, in the City of Madras (z).

Crown grants.—The Act has been repealed as to Crown grants by the Crown Grants Act, 1895 (15 of 1895).

Power to extend.—Powers are reserved by the Act to the Governors of Bombay, the Punjab and British Burma to extend the whole or any part of the Act to the whole or any specified part of the territories under their respective administration from time to time by notification in the local official Gazette.

Extend this Act or any part thereof (a).—The power to extend any part of the Act did not authorize a Local Government to extend particular sections of the Act so as to give those sections a different operation from that which they had in the Act itself read as a whole. The Local Government of Lower Burma by notification extended in 1904 various sections including section 123 but not in terms section 129 to the Pegu District. The rule of Mahomedan Law that a gift is not valid unless possession has been delivered is preserved by section 129 of the Act. In 1914 a Mahomedan conveyed immoveable property in the Pegu District to his wife by a registered deed. He effected mutation into her name but continued to manage the property himself. It was held that the Local Government was not authorized by section 1 to extend section 123 apart from section 129 and consequently that the above rule of Mahomedan Law applied and the gift was valid (b). Legislation, conditional on the use of particular powers or on the exercise of a limited discretion, entrusted by the Legislature to persons in whom it places confidence, is not uncommon and, in many circumstances, it may be highly convenient (c).

Exempt either retrospectively or prospectively.—No such exemption has yet been made.

Exemption for certain provisions.—Powers are given to the Local Governments from time to time by notification in the official Gazette to exempt any part of the territories administered by them either retrospectively or prospectively from all or Limit of Local Governments on powers of extension.—The powers of the Local Governments mentioned in the section to extend the whole or part of the Act are limited so as not to extend to any district or tract of country excluded from the operation of the Indian Registration Act, 1908, under the power conferred by the first section of that Act or otherwise.

The excepted sections.—Sections 54 (paragraphs 2 and 3), 59, 107 and 123 of the Act have been extended with effect from 1st January 1908 to the Settlement of Aden and to Sheikh Othman (d) and to every cantonment in British India (e).

Last clause of the section.—This was added by section 2 of Act 3 of 1885 and it is deemed to have been added from the date on which the Act came into force.

1908.—This is the year of the Registration Act now in force. These figures were substituted for 1877 by section 2 of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, 20 of 1929, but prior to the Amending Act, 1908 was used for 1877 under section 8 of the General Clauses Act, 1897.

2. In the territories to which this Act extends for the time being, the enactments specified in the Schedule hereto annexed shall be repealed to the extent therein mentioned. But nothing herein contained shall be deemed to affect—

Repeal of Acts.

Saving of certain enactments, incidents, rights, liabilities, &c.

- (a) the provisions of any enactment not hereby expressly repealed :
- (b) any terms or incidents of any contract or constitution of property which are consistent with the provisions of this Act, and are allowed by the law for the time being in force :
- (c) any right or liability arising out of a legal relation constituted before this Act comes into force, or any relief in respect of any such right or liability : or
- (d) save as provided by section 57 and Chapter IV of this Act, any transfer by operation of law, or by, or in execution of, a decree or order of a Court of competent jurisdiction :

And nothing in the second chapter of this Act shall be deemed to affect any rule of . . . Muhammadan . . . law.

Herein.—This word means “in this Act” and not “in this section” (f) but in Srinath Das v. Khetter Mohun Sing (g) Lord Hobhouse, delivering judgment, stated as follows:—

“The subsequent creation of suits for foreclosure could not, except by clear enactment, revive the extinct right, and in effect the clear enactment is the other way, for s. 2, cl. (c) of the Transfer of Property Act says that nothing therein shall affect any right or liability arising out of legal relation constituted before this Act comes into force, or any relief in respect of such right or liability.”

Here the word “therein” governs section 2, clause (c). As for the case of Jibanti Nath Khan v. Gokool Chunder Chowdry (h), it is enough to say that that case was decided without reference to the Act: the patni lease in that case was granted and the patni created before the Act came into operation.

“Affect.”—This is a term which means either validate or invalidate. The phrase “be deemed to affect” has frequently been interpreted to mean “shall apply to”—a construction which it is submitted is erroneous.

Clause (a).—Clause (a) saves enactments not expressly repealed.

Repeal of Acts.—This Act repeals Statutes, Acts and Regulations specified in the Schedule but saves enactments, incidents, rights, liabilities and transfers mentioned in the clauses that follow:—

As observed by Bovill, C.J., in R. v. Champneys (i): “It is a fundamental rule in the construction of statutes, that a subsequent statute in general terms is not to be construed to repeal a previous particular statute, unless there are express words to indicate that such was the intention, or unless such an intention appears by necessary implication.” The reason for the presumption against a repeal by implication in these cases, as stated by Wood, V.C., is “in passing a special Act, the Legislature had their attention directed to the special case which the Act was meant to meet, and considered and provided for all the circumstances of that special case; and, having done so, they are not to be considered by a general enactment passed subsequently, and making no mention of any such intention, to have intended to derogate from that which, by their own special Act, they had thus carefully supervised and regulated” (j).

C., a registered khatedar of certain unalienated lands, executed a rajinama on August 11, 1904 of the khata in favour of D. who undertook to pay the land revenue thereafter. In 1911 C. by a registered sale deed sold the lands to the plaintiff who filed a suit for possession from D. It was held that the method of relinquishment adopted in 1904 was that provided by section 74 of the Land Revenue Code made more easy by section 90 of the Registration Act (XVI of 1908) which exempted such rajinama from registration. The contention that in the absence of a registered sale deed as required by section 54 of the present Act the deed of relinquishment could not operate to transfer ownership to D. was rejected, inasmuch as by reason of clause (a) of section (2) nothing in the present Act could affect a relinquishment made by law then existing (k). A patnidar is entitled to manufacture bricks in the absence of a clause in the patni lease forbidding it. Patni taluks are really grants of the zemindar's interest without restrictions unless specially mentioned in the pattah. It is not possible to apply all the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act by analogy to patni taluks. The Transfer of Property Act contains a saving clause for the patnis governed by Regulation VIII of 1819 (l).

Clause (b).—This clause relates to saving of terms or incidents of any contract or property. As an illustration of clause (b) in this country a partition between co-owners does not require to be effectuated or evidenced by a written document, and there is nothing in the Act to warrant the suggestion that the Legislature intended to make any alteration in the recognized law on the subject (m). Nor is there any provision of law requiring that partitions or family settlements must be reduced to writing and the writing registered, though when reduced to writing the point of registration may arise (n). There is no prohibition in the Transfer of Property Act prohibiting an oral partition (o). A document affecting a division of status is not a transaction affecting immoveable property, such an interest is created not by virtue of the instrument but by operation of the rules of Hindu Law (p). The fact of partition may be proved by oral evidence although the deed embodying the terms of partition cannot be proved for want of registration (q). The date of giving and taking of possession by the several sharers of their several lots would be held to be the date on which the joint holding ceased to be joint and became severalty (r).

Clause (c).—The general rule is that Acts are prospective and not retrospective in their operation (s). To this rule there are two exceptions. First, when Acts are expressly declared to be retrospective or placed in a statutory form the rules of law which had already been adopted by the Courts in India (t) which are directed by the several charters to proceed when the law is silent with justice, equity and good conscience and thus adopt the English Law (u), and secondly when they only affect the procedure of the Court (v). A right of appeal is not a matter of procedure (w).

- S. 2 Where a section mixes procedure and rights so much of it as regulates procedure is given a retrospective effect, which is denied to the residue (x), a proposition distinguished in a later case (y) both being under the Deccan Agriculturist Relief Act XVII of 1879. Retrospective effect was given in the case of a mortgage of 1859 in the absence of a rule of law that prevailed at the time or on failure to establish that whatever was the law that prevailed at the date of the mortgage it was not in conflict with the provisions of the Act and thus the specific rule in section 63 as to compensation between a mortgagor and mortgagee was applied and not the general rule laid down in section 51 (z). But it has been held that it was not possible to apply all the provisions in the Transfer of Property Act by analogy to pattni taluks (a). The sections of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, which related to procedure were consigned to the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908. Both clause (c) of section 2 and section 6 of the General Clauses Act (X of 1897) came up for consideration in a suit for foreclosure under a deed of conditional sale under Regulation XVII of 1806. Under the law in force by virtue of that Regulation a mortgagee had the right of foreclosing the mortgage by notice served through the Court. This was a substantive right vested in the mortgagee, for on the expiration of a year of grace he became absolute owner. It was held that this right was not affected by the Act for it arose out of a relationship between the mortgagor and mortgagee constituted before the Act came into operation. Consequently the right accruing to the mortgagee under the Regulation was saved by clause (c). Then again, on the service of the notice for foreclosure a certain liability on the part of the mortgagor arose out of that relation, viz., losing the right of redemption. That liability also remained unaffected by this clause. A similar effect follows from the provisions of clause 6 of the General Clauses Act (b). The same principle was applied where the mortgagee had acquired the right of an absolute owner while the Regulation was in force, and sued for possession after the passing of the present Act, the Court holding that the mortgagee was entitled to a decree such as he would have had if the Regulation had been still in force (c).

Yet another case arose under the same Regulation which went up to the Privy Council which refused to revive an extinguished right under the following circumstances:—The mortgagor's right of possession under the Regulation was brought to an end without a foreclosure suit and a right of entry accrued to the mortgagee whose suit for possession became barred on the lapse of 12 years from the date the mortgagor's right to possession determined. The mortgagor sold parcels of the mortgaged land to purchasers without notice of the proceedings under the Regulation. In a suit after the passing of the Transfer of Property Act against the purchasers and the mortgagor for foreclosure and possession by a transferee of the mortgagee's interest, it was held that the mortgagor's right of possession having been determined in 1866, the mortgagor's right of suing for possession became extinguished in 1878, such right was not revived by the subsequent creation of suits for foreclosure on the coming into operation of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, and that the title of the mortgagee's transferee was barred by time, and the suit against the purchasers was dismissed; as against the mortgagor who made no defence the right of possession in the mortgagee consequent on the proceedings under the Regulation in force till its repeal in 1882 supported the decree made against him by the Courts below, from which he had not appealed (d). The Act deals with substantive rights only and this saving clause has reference to rights acquired and liabilities incurred before the first day of July 1882, the date on which the Act came into force. As distinguished from the first part of the clause the latter part refers to the enforcement of that right or imposition of that liability. Hence the word "relief" has no reference to the mode of that enforcement or imposition which is a matter of procedure prescribed by adjective law. Thus the clause reproduces one of the canons for the interpretation of statutes, that a legal relation created before the Act cannot be disturbed by any of its provisions. The provisions of section 108, clause (c) prohibiting a lessee from working mines or quarries not open when the lease was granted do not apply to a lease granted in 1865 (e). A usufructuary mortgage was executed in 1846 under which the mortgagee had obtained possession and the profits from the property had discharged the mortgage money with interest at 12 per cent. per annum. Regulation XXXIV of 1803 was in force at the date of the mortgage. The mortgagor contended that he was entitled to redeem. The mortgagee resisted redemption on the ground that the transaction was regulated by Act IV of 1882 and that he was entitled to interest at the contract rate which was more than 12 per cent. per annum. It was held by virtue of clause (c) of section 2, the rights and liabilities were saved and the provisions of the Regulation had not been disturbed by operation of any subsequent legislation (f). Again, the sections of the Act relating to notice do not apply to suits in ejectment before the Act came into operation (g). In a mortgage-deed executed before the Act its provisions do not affect the rights and liabilities of the parties to the mortgage or the relief in respect of such rights or liabilities (h). A had a money decree on 20-11-1881 against B and a mortgage-deed dated 6-10-1875. In execution of the money decree A had the mortgage lands attached on 9-3-1882 and sold subject to the mortgage. He purchased them with the permission of the Court and transferred to C and D. The order for sale was in April 1882. The Act came into force on 1st of July 1882. It was held that the Act had no retrospective effect so as to disturb the legal relations created before the Act came into force (i). And so the incident of non-transferability attached to ordinary tenancies of agricultural lands and tenancies from year to year of homestead lands are not affected by section 108 (i) of this Act (j). Nor does the Act affect a non-permanent tenure created before the Act (k).

Section 11 of the Bengal Tenancy Act imports that non-permanent tenures are not to be regarded as transferable.

Instances of sales of holdings recognized on payment of nazarana by the landlord do not prove usage of transferability. The usage to be proved is a usage of

- S. 2 sale (l). A mokurari was created before the Act and patni was granted of the zemindary within which the mokurari was created. In 1886 both the mokurari and patni were acquired by the same individual. It was held that section 111 (d) did not cause a merger of the two interests (m). In cases unaffected by the provisions of the Act the union of a superior and subordinate interest do not necessarily merge yet the conduct of the party may shew that he did not intend to keep the two interests alive as mutually distinct rights (n). The Privy Council, dealing with a case of denial of landlord's title, refused to apply section 111 (g) of the Act as the provision was not retrospective and did not govern the case (o). Hence the Act is not retrospective but a different rule prevails in matters of procedure.

The right to relief arising from a certain jural relation existing between parties is a matter of adjective law and consequently the parties are entitled, where a new remedy has been provided by a new Act at the time when the relation subsists, to take advantage of that remedy in a Court of Law. And so where a mortgage by conditional sale before the Act did not purport to sell but only contained a covenant by the mortgagor to relinquish all rights in the property as if it had been sold in case of default in payment on stipulated date, the document was construed as a mortgage by conditional sale and the remedies given by section 67 was made available and that there was nothing in section 2 (c) to disentitle them from so doing (p). In a suit for ejectment to avail of clause (c) defendant must establish that her right as it exists at present arose of a legal relation constituted before the Act came into force (q).

Although the legal relation of mortgagor and mortgagee was constituted in 1879 the right to attach the property and bring it to sale and the relief in respect of such right arose only out of the decree of 1884 which was subsequent to the Transfer of Property Act. The right to enforce the decree is a substantive right but the mode of enforcing it is a matter of procedure (r). On a single mortgage bond dated 5th April 1879 the mortgagee filed a suit on 21st January 1881 and obtained a decree on 31st July 1882. It was held that the pending suit was not governed by the Act. It was not the intention of that section to render ineffectual suits instituted and decrees made under the procedure in force before the Act was passed for every decree-holder would be obliged to file a suit under section 67 (s). Before the Act there was no distinction between agricultural and non-agricultural tenancies. And there was no law before the Transfer of Property Act under which agricultural holdings could be transferred against the will of the landlord or subdivided without his consent (t).

The provisions of the Transfer of Property Act apply to the assignment of a mortgage made after that Act came into force although the mortgage may have been made before the commencement of the Act (u).

Changes in the section.—Hindus and Buddhists were formerly excluded from the operation of the second chapter relating to Transfer of Property whether moveable or immoveable. By the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, it has been made applicable to them.

Clause (d).—This clause does not exclude transfers mentioned from the operation of this Act. It only enacts that the provisions of the Act shall not "affect" them. Even before the passing of the Act it was held that under an execution sale the purchaser acquired title by operation of law (v). A sale by the Official Receiver under the Provincial Insolvency Act is not a transfer by operation of law or by or in execution of a decree or order (w) nor is a charge created by a liquidator on the assets of a company in course of being wound up by authority of the Court (x). By reason of this clause the implied covenant for title in section 55 (2) is not annexed to the interest of a transferee at a Court-sale (y).

Nor do the provisions of section 36 as to apportionment of rent (z) or those of section 51 relating to improvements made by bona fide holders under defective titles (a) apply to execution sales. Prior to its repeal by Act 2 of 1900 the original section 135 of the Act was held not to affect transfers in execution (b). And a purchase by a legal practitioner of a claim under a life insurance policy in execution is enforceable notwithstanding section 136 (c). A security bond obtained by the Court hypothecating immoveable property to secure moneys due to minors is not affected by the Act and an assignment thereof to the minors on attaining majority to enable them to realize the money from the security need not be stamped or registered but may be made by an order of the Court nor is such an assignment to a third person a transfer of an interest in immoveable property being an authorization by the Court to sue upon it (d).

Holding that the purchase of a patni lease by the purchaser who was at that time zemindar of the property, affected a merger under section 111 (d) of the Transfer of Property Act, it was pointed out that there was no distinction qua the law of merger between the result of a transfer by act of parties and one by operation of law and that what clause (d) of section 2 meant was that the various provisions in the Act regulating and codifying the law as to actual transfers by act of parties should not affect transfers by operation of law (e).

The Punjab.—The Act has not been extended to the Punjab though the Courts there apply its provisions as embodying the principles of the Common Law based on equity, justice and good conscience. It has, however, been held there that clause (d) contains a highly technical provision which could not be invoked to defeat a creditor's suit for a declaration that the debtor has transferred property to defeat or delay creditors (f). A contrary view is, however, held by the Allahabad High Court which applied the principles embodied in section 53 to a transfer by virtue of a decree on an award though the provisions of section 53 of the Act did not in terms apply thereto (g).

Hindu Law.—Prior to the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, it was enacted that rules in the second chapter shall not affect any rule of Hindu Law. Subsequent legislation such as the Hindu Disposition of Property Act, XV of 1916, the Madras Act 1 of 1914 and the Madras Act VIII of 1921 has rendered retention of the word “Hindu” in the section unnecessary, for the inconsistencies that subsisted have now been removed by the above legislation and by sections 11, 12 and 13 of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Supplementary Act, 21 of 1929, amending the aforesaid Acts.

Mahomedan Law.—The section declares that the provisions of the second chapter relating to transfers of property whether moveable or immoveable shall not be deemed to affect any rule of Mahomedan Law. The reason for this express enactment is to save the rules of Mahomedan Law in various branches of transfer which are inconsistent with the law as laid down in the Act. Thus the creation of life-interests amongst Sunnis whether or not followed by vested remainders are not recognized by Mahomedan Law (*g*¹). The formalities necessary for a valid gift in Mahomedan Law differ from those laid down in Chapter VIII of the Act and remain unaffected by them. Again, a Mahomedan may make an oral gift of immoveable property a privilege unknown to the law as laid down in the Act. The rule of equity in section 52 of the Act is not opposed to the principles of Mahomedan Law as to preclude its application to Mahomedans (h). The Courts in India permit Mahomedans through the instrumentality of a wakf to trench on the law of perpetuity as laid down in section 14 of the Transfer of Property Act. The peculiar rules of the law of pre-emption are preserved to them and the creation of joint tenancies unknown to English Law are favoured. But the Act does not state that Chapter II shall not apply to Mahomedans. The word “affect” occurring in the first part of the section is repeated in the concluding portion thereof and so where a question arose whether a partial restraint on alienation was valid, the Privy Council applied the rule in section 10 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, recognizing the validity of a partial restraint on alienation in the absence of any authority suggesting that prior to the Act a different principle was applied by the Courts in India (i).

Buddhist Law.—The rules relating to transfers, whether moveable or immoveable property, in Chapter II were declared prior to the Amending Act, 20 of 1920, not to affect rules of Buddhist Law but the inconsistencies anterior to the amendment having disappeared, no occasion remains for the retention of the word “or Buddhist” in the section.

Interpretation clause.

3. In this Act, unless there is something repugnant in the subject or context—

“Immoveable property”

“immoveable property” does not include standing timber, growing crops or grass

“Instrument”

(i) Muhammad Reza v. Abbas Bandi Bibi (1932) 59 I. A. 236.

“attested” in relation to an instrument means, and shall be deemed always to have meant, attested by two or more witnesses each of whom has seen the executant sign or affix his mark to the instrument, or has seen some other person sign the instrument in the presence and by the direction of the executant, or has received from the executant a personal acknowledgment of his signature or mark, or of the signature of such other person, and each of whom has signed the instrument in the presence of the executant ; but it shall not be necessary that more than one of such witnesses shall have been present at the same time, and no particular form of attestation shall be necessary ;

“registered” means registered in British India under the law for the time being in force regulating the registration of documents :

“attached to the earth” means :—

- (a) rooted in the earth, as in the case of trees and shrubs ;
- (b) imbedded in the earth, as in the case of walls or buildings ;
- (c) attached to what is so imbedded for the permanent beneficial enjoyment of that to which it is attached :

“actionable claim” means a claim to any debt, other than a debt secured by mortgage of immoveable property or by hypothecation or pledge of moveable property, or to any beneficial interest in moveable property not in the possession, either actual or constructive, of the claimant, which the Civil Courts recognize as affording grounds for relief, whether such debts or beneficial interest be existent, accruing, conditional or contingent ;

A person is said to have “notice” of a fact when he actually knows that fact or when, but for wilful abstention from an inquiry or search which he ought to have made, or gross negligence, he would have known it.

EXPLANATION I.—Where any transaction relating to immoveable property is required by law to be and has been effected by a registered instrument, any person acquiring such property or any part of, or share or interest in, such property shall be deemed to have notice of such instrument

S. 3 as from the date of registration or, where the property is not all situated in one sub-district, or where the registered instrument has been registered under sub-section (2) of section 30 of the Indian Registration Act, 1908, from the earliest date on which any memorandum of such registered instrument has been filed by any Sub-Registrar within whose sub-district any part of the property which is being acquired or of the property wherein a share or interest is being acquired, is situated :

Provided that—

- (1) the instrument has been registered and its registration completed in the manner prescribed by the Indian Registration Act, 1908, and the rules made thereunder,
- (2) the instrument or memorandum has been duly entered or filed, as the case may be, in books kept under section 51 of that Act, and
- (3) the particulars regarding the transaction to which the instrument relates have been correctly entered in the indexes kept under section 55 of that Act.

EXPLANATION II.—Any person acquiring any immovable property or any share or interest in any such property shall be deemed to have notice of the title, if any, of any person who is for the time being in actual possession thereof.

EXPLANATION III.—A person shall be deemed to have had notice of any fact if his agent acquires notice thereof whilst acting on his behalf in the course of business to which that fact is material :

Provided that, if the agent fraudulently conceals the fact, the principal shall not be charged with notice thereof as against any person who was a party to or otherwise cognizant of the fraud.

Interpretation clause.—See the same caption in the commentaries to the preamble.

Immoveable property.—Immoveable property is not defined in the Act which enumerates certain items by way of exclusion. This enumeration is neither comprehensive nor exhaustive as is indicated by the word "include" (j). The exclusion is intended to avoid conflict with the law of attachment. Under section 2 (9)

(j) Balantray v. Purshotam (1872) 9. Bom. H. C. 99; Empress v. Ramanjiyya (1878) 2 Mad. 5; Mangaldas v. Jawanram (1899) 23 Bom. 673; Nasiben v. Prasunhar (1882) 8 Cal.

534; Empress v. Ashoolosh (1879) 4 Cal. 483, 493; Shiv Dayal v. Puthi Lal (1932) 54 All. 437.

of the Indian Registration Act these items are moveables. It has also received interpretation in the Indian Trustees Act (k) and the Trustees and Mortgagees Powers Act (l) and defined in the Indian Registration Act (m) and the General Clauses Act (n). The term has come up for Judicial determination under various enactments. Apart from the Registration Act the Courts have held that a right of ferry is (o) but a right of way is not (p) immoveable property for the purpose of section 9 of the Specific Relief Act. Nor is a hat the possession of which is held by collecting tolls or rents (q). For the purpose of the Registration Act a right to collect market dues is a benefit to arise out of land (r). Again, a lease of a hat or the right to collect market dues (s) and a hat can be the subject of a valid mortgage (t). But a pala or turn of worship is not immoveable property (u) nor is a karch-i-pandan a personal allowance by a Mahomedan husband to his wife even though secured by a charge on immoveable property (v).

The right to parsipan in Nimar is similar to pala and is not immoveable property (w). A right to rents and income bequeathed by will to the widow during the term of her natural life subject to the maintenance and education of the children is immoveable property (x). Within the meaning of the Limitation Act a claim to possession and management of jaghir villages known as Saranjams is an interest in immoveable property (y) but the right of a purchaser to have lands registered in his name in the revenue records is not an interest in immoveable property (z). A right to officiate as priest at funeral ceremonies of Hindus is in the nature of immoveable property. The right ranks amongst immoveable property in Hindu Law (a). The texts on the subject are collected in two Bombay cases (b). After referring to the rule of construction in these two cases, the Privy Council observed : " To the application of this rule within proper limits, their Lordships see no objection. The question must in every case, be whether the subject of the suit is in the nature of immoveable property or of an interest in immoveable property ; and if its nature and quality can be only determined by Hindu Law and usage, the Hindu Law may properly be invoked for that purpose " (c). The " nature and quality " of the property in such a case can only be determined by Hindu Law, because it is not recognized as property in any other system of law.

A Yajman Vritti, an obligation imposed upon the purohit or family priest to perform certain religious rites carrying with it certain emoluments is not immoveable property (d). A jalkar or right of fishery is immoveable property within the General Clauses Act (e). A suit for rent of a fishery is immoveable property within

S. 3 section 18 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (f). When a grant is merely of a fishery the lessee acquires no interest in the sub-soil and is not entitled to retain possession when the water dries up (g). A lease granted for fishing creates an interest in immoveable property but not for Singhara cultivation (h). A right to extra-territorial fishery is not immoveable property for all purposes; but it is an interest in immoveable property (i). A right to collect rents of shops or houses from persons actually occupying them is immoveable property (j). Nibandha such as a right to assessment (k) or a right to levy toll on exports of paddy from foreign territory is immoveable property (l). So also a grant by a Hindu sovereign to a Hindu temple (m). Both before and after the Act was passed it was held that malikana which is an annual recurring charge on immoveable property, constitutes an interest in land (n), so also varhasans or annual allowance charged on the revenue of villages in the Nizam's territory (o). A mortgage of immoveable property is itself immoveable property whatever may be the form of the mortgage (p). The interest of a mortgagee is immoveable property (q) but not according to the Madras High Court (r). The Bombay and Allahabad High Courts have taken the same view as the Calcutta High Court (s). A second mortgage like the first is also immoveable property (t). A mortgage debt is immoveable property (u). The right of a mortgagor, known as the equity of redemption, is also immoveable property (v) though not for the purpose of determining the procedure appropriate to attachment (w). And so is air space above land (x).

Standing timber.—According to the interpretation clause this item is excluded from the category of immoveable property. Here we have a negative definition but it is apparent that standing timber was intended to be cjusdem generis with "growing crops" or "grass" and the latter articles not only do not connote the idea of permanence but their use and enjoyment can be secured by the use of the sickle. The subject whether a tree is moveable or standing timber or an interest in immoveable property is one about which there has been considerable difference of opinion in this country and the decisions somewhat conflicting. The trend of authorities is to divide trees into two groups, one in which the timber is to be used for building purposes and the other where the purpose is to enjoy the fruits from it. The latter is regarded as immoveable property while the former as moveable. The conflict, however, arises when the same kind of tree is regarded by one Court as moveable and by another as immoveable property. For general law reference may be made to Marshall v. Green (y), a case under the statute of frauds which does not apply to this country in which is to be found the following statement of law :

"The principle of these decisions appears to be this, that wherever at the time of the contract it is contemplated that the purchaser should derive a benefit from the further growth of the thing sold from further vegetation and from the nutriment to be afforded by the land, the contract is to be considered as for an interest in land: but where the process of vegetation is over or the parties agree that the thing sold shall be immediately withdrawn from the land, the land is to be considered as a mere warehouse of the thing sold and the contract is for goods."

The aforesaid principle has the high authority of Sir Edward Vaughan Williams and has a classic flavour about it. This principle would be applicable to India though the statute is not. The test is to look to what the parties intended to contract for. If the intention is to enjoy the fruit only it is immovable (z). A mortgage of fruit-bearing trees has been held to be of immovable property (a). So also a lease which gave a right to the enjoyment of forest produce, grass, etc. (b) but a theka of a certain portion of a forest "for all kinds of trees" is not of an interest in immovable property (c). Where the intention is to cut and remove, the tree is moveable, and so a contract for cutting all kinds of trees to be converted into charcoal upon the ground, was held to be standing timber within the meaning of this definition (d). Where during the currency of the contract to take toddy and fruit during a specified period the trees were to remain available for the use specified in it and there was no limitation on the transferor's enjoyment of the land as such, it was held that the contract did not affect the nutriment the land afforded to the trees, their juice or fruit and that no interest in immovable property was transferred (e). As regards trees which produce fruit or other forest produce they have been regarded as immovable, such as a mahua grove (f), a mango tree (g). A fruit tree may not always come within the term "standing timber" unless by custom of the locality its wood is used in building houses (h).

The Bombay and Allahabad High Courts, as seen, have held that a mango tree is immovable property, a view doubted by the Patna High Court (i) and accepted with limitation by the Madras High Court. The Bombay High Court has qualified the term "timber" as meaning property in such trees only as are fit to be used in building and repairing houses. The Madras High Court while holding that karuvela and velvela trees were timber within the meaning of the section, took exception to the limitation by saying that the term timber cannot be limited to the class of trees the timber of which is used for building purposes and that whatever may be the purpose to which a mango tree is put in the Bombay Presidency, in Southern India mango-planks were used for doors, windows and other articles of wooden furniture (j). When there is no actual removal of the thing sold the governing principle would be whether there is actual possession of the thing sold and something actually done to the thing sold by the buyer which could only be properly done by an absolute owner. Under the Indian Forest Act (XVI of

- S. 3 1927), section 2, clause 4 (a), forest produce includes "timber, charcoal, caoutchouc, catechu, wood-oil, resin, natural varnish, bark, lac, mahua flowers, mahua seeds and myrabolams."

Crops.—These are moveable property according to the interpretation clause. The word is used in section 51 and crops to grow in future are immoveable property (k). A mortgage of indigo crops that may be grown was held to be a transaction not governed by the Act (l). By section 2 (7) of the Indian Sale of Goods Act (III of 1930), "goods" include, inter alia, growing crops, grass and things attached to or forming part of the land which are agreed to be severed before sale or under the contract of sale, and "future goods" means goods to be manufactured or produced or acquired by the seller after the making of the contract for sale. The contract for the sale of goods will be found in sections 6, 7 and 8 of the same Act. Growing crops are not immoveable property. A mortgage of such crops amounts to an agreement to hypothecate future crops. When the crops grow the hypothecation attaches to the crops, creating an equitable interest in the lender (m). Under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, section 2 (13), "moveable property" includes growing crops. The Calcutta High Court in dealing with a suit for damages for wrongful seizure of standing crops under distress, held that they were immoveable property (n) and so are they also under section 3 (25) of the General Clauses Act, 1897, which is a wider definition. Recently, bamboo clumps as standing crops were held immoveable (o) though a crop of sugarcane was held moveable (p). A mortgage of property which is to come into existence in the future is a valid transaction enforceable by Courts of Equity (q). Under the Indian Forest Act (XVI of 1927), section 2, clause 6, "timber" includes trees when they have fallen or have been felled, and all wood whether cut up or fashioned or hollowed out for any purpose or not, and under clause 7 "tree" includes bamboos, stumps, brushwood and canes.

Pan creepers which have no existence apart from their produce as they are uprooted when the pan has been gathered are moveables (r). A transfer of possession of parsa or palas tree with a right to take the crops of lac each year is a transaction relating to immoveable property (s).

Grass.—The Madras High Court, in Seeni Chettiar v. Santhanathan (t), observed it has long been settled that an agreement for the sale and purchase of growing grass, growing timber or underwood, or growing fruit, not made with a view to their immediate severance and removal from the soil and delivery as chattels to the purchaser, is a contract for the sale of an interest in land. It is included in the term "goods" under the Sale of Goods Act (III of 1930).

Instrument.—The word is not defined. By way of interpretation it includes a non-testamentary instrument as opposed to a will or testamentary instrument. Under section 2 (14) of the Indian Stamp Act, 1899, it includes "every document by which any right or liability is, or purports to be, created, transferred, limited, extended, extinguished or recorded." A definition which has been held to cover an account written on a sheet of paper (u) as also an entry in a book purporting to be a register of sums payable with respect to the letting out of wooden machines and rollers (v). All fiscal enactments are, however, construed strictly. In construing section 49 of the Indian Registration Act, XX of 1866, it was held that the word was used on the understanding that the writing was not merely evidence of the transaction but was the transaction itself (w).

Registered.—This subject is treated in section 59, q.v.

Attached to the earth.—This phrase is defined to mean as rooted in the earth or imbedded in the earth. Clause (c) is an enlargement of clause (b). It implies a union with the hereditaments as to form an integral part thereof. Clause (a) refers to what is attached by nature, clause (b) to annexations of a personal nature or physical annexation. The phrase is used in sections 8 and 108 (h) of this Act and in section 3 (25) of the General Clauses Act. The presumption which arises from the definition may be rebutted by the subject or context wherever there is a contrary intention in determining whether or not a chattel has become a fixture: the intention of the person affixing it to the soil is material only so far as it can be presumed from the degree and object of annexation (x). In English Law this subject is dealt with under the law of fixtures. The principles on which they rested were relaxed in favour of agriculture as also trade and between landlord and tenant when affixed for ornament and convenience. There the law was originally founded on the maxims, “quid quid inædificatur solo solo cedit” and “quid quid plantatur solo solo cedit” which have not received so wide an application here as there.

The word ‘fixture,’ though of common use in English Law, has no precise legal meaning (y). In England it does not necessarily mean annexed to the freehold though in India for anything to be a fixture it must be “attached to the earth” as that expression is defined in section 3 of this Act. Following the observations in Thakoor Chander Poramanick v. Ram Dhone Bhattacharjee (z), the Privy Council held that in India there is no absolute rule of law that whatever is affixed or built on the soil becomes part of it, and is subject to the same rights or property as the soil itself (a). It must further be remembered that the tendency under English Law has been to restrict rather than to enlarge the scope and operation of the law of fixtures and various exceptions have been allowed. Under such circumstances it would obviously be inappropriate to extend the English doctrine of fixtures to this country as based on equitable grounds, and this position is fortified for neither the Hindu Law, as pointed out by Sir Barnes Peacock, C. J., in Paramanick’s case (b) nor the Mahomedan Law, as pointed out by the Privy Council in Secretary of State v. Charlesworth Pilling & Co. (c), recognized any law of fixtures. The Transfer of Property Act substantially reproduces the law on the subject as recognized by Hindu and Mahomedan jurisprudence (d).

How far nature of attachment material.—The occasion for the limited and yet guarded application of the English rule as to fixtures arises when the question is whether an article is “attached to the earth” as defined by clauses (b) and (c). The English Courts have held that the mode of annexation and the object and purpose of annexation must be looked at (c). The same principle is embodied in clauses (b) and (c). Holding that machinery fixed by screws, some into the wooden floors of a cotton mill and some by being sunk into the stone flooring and secured by molten lead, was not a part of the freehold, Parke, B., said: "The only question is, whether the machines when fixed were parcel of the freehold and this is a question of fact, depending on the circumstances of each case, and principally on two considerations: first, the mode of annexation to the soil, or fabric of the house and the extent to which it is united to them, whether it can easily be removed, integre, salve, et commode, or not, without injury to itself or the fabric of the building; secondly, on the object and purpose of the annexation, whether it was for the permanent and substantial improvement of the dwelling, or merely for a temporary purpose, or the more complete enjoyment and use of it as a chattel" (f). The doctrine which was the basis of many of the older cases that whatever is affixed, however slightly, to the soil, becomes part of the freehold, has been dissipated once for all by Leigh v. Taylor (g). The principle laid down in Hellawell v. Eastwood (h) was discussed in several cases including Holland v. Hodgson (i). In that case, Blackburn, J., laid down the true principle that the onus of showing that a chattel is not a fixture lies on those who assert the contrary, a principle relied on by Sargent, J., in Vaudeville Electric Cinema, Ltd. v. Muriset (j), a case of seats affixed solidly to a cinema floor. He said: "Now what is the position with regard to those seats? That they are in fact affixed somewhat solidly to the floor, there can of course be no question. That being so, it seems to me, on the principle laid down by Lord Blackburn, when he was Blackburn, J., in Holland v. Hodgson (k), that the onus of showing they are not fixtures lies on those who assert the contrary. There is no doubt that for the purpose of determining whether they are fixtures or not, one very material circumstance, perhaps the most material circumstance, to be taken into account is, the purpose for which they were fixed. The classic illustration which was given is in regard to an anchor. What Blackburn, J., said was this: 'There is no doubt that the general maxim of the law is, that what is annexed to the land becomes part of the land: but it is very difficult, if not impossible, to say with precision what constitutes an annexation sufficient for this purpose.' It is a question which must depend on the circumstances of each case, and mainly on two circumstances, as indicating the intention, viz., the degree of annexation and the object of the annexation. When, the article in question is no further attached to the land than by its own weight it is generally to be considered a mere chattel; see Wiltshire v. Cottrell (l) and the cases there cited. But even in such a case, if the intention is apparent to make the articles part of the land, they do become part of the land. See D'Eyncourt v. Gregory (m). Thus blocks of stone placed one on the top of another without any mortar or cement for the purpose of forming a dry stone wall would become part of the land, though the same stones, if deposited in a builder's yard and for convenience sake stacked on the top of each other in the form of a wall, would remain chattels. On the other hand, an article may be very firmly fixed to the land, and yet the circumstances may be such as to shew that it was never intended to be part of the land and then it does not become part of the land. The anchor of a large ship must be very firmly fixed in the ground in order to bear the strain of the cable, yet no one could suppose that it became part of the land, even though it should chance that the shipowner was also the owner of the fee of the spot where the anchor was dropped. An anchor similarly fixed in the soil for the purpose of bearing the strain of the chain of a suspension bridge would be part of the land. Perhaps the true rule is, that articles not otherwise attached to the land than by their own weight are not to be considered as part of the land, unless the circumstances are such as to shew that they were intended to be part of the land, the onus of showing that they were so intended lying on those who assert that they ceased to be chattels, and that, on the contrary, an article which is affixed to the land even slightly is to be considered as part of the land, unless the circumstances are such as to shew that it was intended all along to continue a chattel, the onus lying on those who contend that it is a chattel. Applying that to the present case here, I find the seats were affixed to the land, and therefore, as I have said, the onus lies on those who say they were not fixtures."

This case went in a direction opposite to what was decided in Lyon & Co. v. London and City and Midland Bank (n) but there are certain distinguishable features. The contest there was between the persons who owned the chairs and the bank, who were the mortgagees of the interest of the hirer, while in the present case the object and effect of their annexation was the permanent improvement of the building as a place of public entertainment. In the other case the chairs were kept on hire for a comparatively short time. The above rule as to onus does not mean that there must be an inquiry into the motive of the persons who annex them but a consideration of the object and purpose of the annexation as it is to be inferred from the circumstances of the case (o). It must be conceded that there are dicta in other cases and even decisions which shew that for some purposes even machines fixed in concrete beds by bolts and nuts, as in Reynolds v. Ashby & Son (p), have been treated as chattels. There is Hellawell v. Eastwood (q), a case of distress which has been much commented on in later cases and is of questionable authority; there are rating cases such as Chidley v. West Ham (r) and Tyne Boiler Works Co. v. Overseers of Longbenton (s); there is the case of the miners huts, Wake v. Hall (t) which arose between miners in the Peak District and landowners, and turned entirely on a local custom; there is the tapestry case, Leigh v. Taylor (u), which arose between a tenant for life and a remainderman; there is Fisher v. Dixon (v), which arose between the heir and the executors of the deceased owner of the land and the machinery fixed to it. Reynolds v. Ashby & Son (w) afforded the House of Lords an opportunity of re-establishing the true principle. It was there held that machines fixed in a concrete bed by nuts and bolts is a fixture and not a chattel. Where a chattel is for the permanent benefit of the property or where it is essentially a part of the building itself it is a fixture in English Law. Thus a stone garden seat (x), bolts and bars, locks, keys, doors and windows (y), chimney-piece, not ornamental, or brick or mortar pillars built on a dairy floor to hold pans (z), grate built into a chimney (a), advertisements exhibited on substantially fixed boardings (b), boiler screwed to a stone foundation (c), furnaces (d), are fixtures,

S. 3 but not the pipes of a heating apparatus connected with the boiler by screws (e). Exceptions have been engrafted on the above rules in favour of trade (f), and in a minor degree for agriculture. Accessories or adjuncts to trade fixtures and which have no other existence or purpose may be removed but not brick buildings let into the freehold although used as such accessories (g). One cannot profess to reconcile all the cases on fixtures under English Law, but a fire-engine to work a colliery (h), copper and brewing vessels (i), sheds (j), engines and boilers (k), the pipes of a heating apparatus (l), lime-kilns (m) have all been held to be moveable as a latitude to trade. The same indulgence has been carried still further in case of ornamental fixtures such as chimney-pieces, pier-glasses, hangings, wainscot fixed only by screws and the like (n), as also pumps, stoves, grates and other articles of domestic convenience (o). Similarly, chairs in a theatre screwed to the floor (p). Unless, as already observed, the articles form an essential and integral part of the property to which they are attached and are for the permanent benefit thereof. Gasaliers are not (q), though electric filament lamps are (r), chattels; the former are necessary to the practical enjoyment of the gas-pipes to which they are attached, in the latter case the electric installation is complete without the lamps.

In India also doors and windows (s), tiled huts (t), materials of a house before it is pulled down (u), have been held to be attached to the earth. A factory is a part of the land, so also fixed machinery comprised therein (v), but a baling press placed under a building intended to shelter it, was held to be moveable on the ground that it was not attached to a building imbedded in the earth for the beneficial enjoyment thereof but on the other hand the building was put up for the purpose of sheltering the machinery from weather (w).

The Madras High Court, refusing to apply the technical English Law of fixtures, observed that it would be "a dangerous doctrine to hold in this country that plant and machinery brought into a building for the purpose of trade being carried on whether by the owner or by the mortgagee were so annexed to the building as to make them pass for fixtures merely because the building is sold either by the owner or by the Court in execution" and held that a sale of a distillery did not include vats, pipes and stills (x), and where machinery was brought in by a mortgagor after his purchasing the land it was held to be included in his security where under section 8 it would pass to the purchaser on a sale (y). Thus a fixture as understood in English Law may or may not be under Indian Law "attached to the earth."

The English Law itself on the subject is not easily reconcilable. What is not a fixture by that law is also in our law not "attached to the earth." The test whether a structure is "attached to the earth" is incorporation with or adherence to the soil or physical incorporation as part of a structure so incorporated with or adhering to the soil.

Hire-purchase system.—There are cases, however, where, in spite of the protection afforded, trade fixtures have been absorbed by the owner of the freehold or by the mortgagee and so where a machine was fastened down to its concrete bed by bolts and nuts the House of Lords, in a contest between the mortgagee and the owner of the machine who had supplied it to the mortgagor on the hire-purchase system, held that the machine had been so fixed as to pass by the mortgage to the mortgagee. There Lord Lindley observed that "in dealing with them attention must be paid not only to the nature of the thing and to the mode of attachment but to the circumstances under which it was attached, the purpose to be served and last but not least to the position of rival claimants to the things in dispute" (z). And in such cases any intention to be inferred from the terms of the hiring agreement that it should remain a chattel did not prevent it from becoming a fixture (a). In the latter case the mortgage was after the hiring agreement and without notice of it, where an engine was affixed to the freehold by bolts and screws to prevent it from rocking. In the former mortgage was before the hiring agreement.

Buildings.—The question which frequently arises is whether a building is a parcel of the tenement? To be so it must be part and parcel of the freehold. It cannot be so unless it is affixed to it or to something previously connected with it. Thus, a barn set upon pillars (b) or on a foundation of brick and stone (c), the foundation being let into the ground but the barn resting upon it by its own weight alone, and so a wooden shed which could be taken down and removed (d), is a mere chattel. In a Bombay case where a shed was no further attached to the land than by its own weight it was considered to be a chattel (e). Prior to the passing of the Act, oil and flour mills and steam engine and boiler seized in execution of a decree (f), so also a hut (g) and a superstructure of a house referred to in a hypothecation bond which excluded the land beneath (h), were held to be fixtures while the observations of the Full Bench case in Thakoor Chunder Poramanick (i) are "we have not been able to find in the law or custom of this country any traces of the existence of an absolute rule of law that whatever is affixed or built on the soil becomes a part of it, and is subjected to the same rights of property as the soil itself."

exact amount would not make that amount any the less a debt (k). At Common Law a debt was looked upon as a strictly personal obligation and an assignment of it was regarded as a mere assignment of a right to bring an action at law against the debtor. Hence the assignment was looked upon as open to the objection of maintenance. After a time the Common Law Courts recognized the right of anyone who had a pecuniary interest in the debt to sue in the name of the creditors. But Courts of Equity took a different view. They admitted the title of an assignee of a debt regarding it as a piece of property, an asset capable of being dealt with like any other asset, and treating the necessity of an action at law to get it in as a mere incident (l). In order to constitute an assignment of a debt or other chose in action in equity no particular form is necessary. In India it must be signed by either the transferor or his duly authorized agent, but no particular form of words seems to be necessary. The language is immaterial if the meaning is plain (m). An order for payment of money is not the same thing as an assignment of the debt, but a direction in writing to pay the amount due on instrument endorsed on such instrument by the payee thereof, coupled with the delivery of the instrument so endorsed to the person to whom payment is directed, is a valid assignment within the meaning of section 130 (n). The test is whether or not the right of the seller of the goods to the price of the same has been transferred to a third party by an effectual assignment that the assignee becomes entitled as of right to the payment.

The endorsement on the back of a bill was in these terms: "K. kindly remit to B. who will collect on behalf of E." Held that the endorsement did not amount to an assignment of the debt which was owing by K. to E. and that it was nothing more than an order to pay (o). Where an endorsement on a bond was worded as follows: "Is ruppa ko wasul karne ka malik Nanak Chand haiga, main ne ruppa ko Nanak Chand hath baich dai haiga." Dastkhat Bishambar Dyal. Miti Bhadon Sudi 9, Samat 1979" and immediately after there was another endorsement to the following effect: "Is ruppa ka rupai biyaj Nanak Chand Kishori Lal set le lie." Dastkhat Bishambar Dyal. Rupai sab aur biyaj le lie. Dastkhat Bishambar Dyal. Bhadon Sudi 9, Sambat 1979" and the endorsement was also thumb-marked by Bishambar Dyal, held, that the words ruppa ko Nanak Chand hath baich diya haiga clearly indicate that a complete assignment was effected (p). An agreement between a debtor and a creditor that the debt owing shall be paid out of a specific fund coming to the debtor or an order given by a debtor to his creditor to pay such funds to the creditor operates as an equitable assignment (q). In order to constitute an equitable assignment there must be an engagement to pay out of a particular fund (r) and may take the form of an order upon a debtor (s). But a cheque is not (t), nor is a letter of credit (u), though a banker's deposit receipt duly endorsed and delivered would be a good gift though non-transferable (v).

Part of a debt.—There has been a difference as to whether a partial transfer of a debt is valid. Under the Judicature Act, 1873, an assignment of an amount due or to become due has been upheld and so an ascertained part of an existing

S. 3 debt (w). In a later case such an assignment was held not to pass a legal but only an equitable right so as to constitute the assignee a creditor of the original debtor (x). But a judgment debt cannot be split up (y). In India the partial transfer of a debt has been regarded as valid (z). The same Court in an earlier case held that the assignment of a debt must be of the whole debt (a). This was followed by the Calcutta High Court in a recent case (b).

Hypothecation or pledge.—See commentaries on section 58, post.

Beneficial interest.—To attract the application of Chapter VIII this must relate to moveable property only. The benefit of a contract as distinguished from the liability thereunder is assignable because the term “benefit” connotes beneficial right or interest with the attendant right to sue and therefore falls within the definition of actionable claim. Such assignments are, however, subject to two qualifications. First, that the benefit sought to be assigned is not coupled with any liability or obligation that the assignor is bound to fulfil and, secondly, that the contract is not one which has been induced by personal qualifications or considerations as regards the parties to it (c). Examples of transfer of benefits of contracts are found in brewers’ leases (d), contract for the purchase of reversionary interest (e). Not uncommon are assignments of contracts for the purchase of lands and of builders’ leases where persons buy building plots and sell them before buildings are erected thereon. But, as observed above, as liabilities cannot be transferred all acts are done and obligations fulfilled in the name of the assignor by the assignee, the assignor remaining liable till the contract is carried out to the original party. A vendor’s right under an executory contract to exercise an option at a certain future date to obtain a reconveyance of immovable property at a certain price is assignable (f). The benefit of a contract under a “counterpart document” to reconvey property sold has been held assignable (g). But a personal right or covenant cannot be validly transferred (h).

Civil Courts.—The claim to the “debt” or “beneficial interest” must be one cognizable by a Civil Court. Where the claim is one which would lie in a Revenue Court (i) or a Criminal Court it would not be an actionable claim.

Notice and its sub-divisions.—Mere rumours (j), casual conversation (k), statements by strangers (l), do not amount to notice. An advertisement is not notice unless it is proved to have reached the knowledge of the person sought to be charged (m). Notice may be actual or constructive or, as sometimes termed, “imputed” in dealings where an agent represents a principal. The definition and explanation have been held not to have a retrospective effect (*m*¹).

Actual notice.—Actual notice must be given to a person in the character in which the notice is intended to affect him and not in any other character (n). It must be given not by a stranger but must proceed from a person interested in the property (o). It will bind, though inaccurate in particulars or extent of interest claimed (p). It will not be carried beyond the reason of the rule (q). The fact that for some purpose at some time or other the mortgagee informed the Court of the mortgage is not evidence of notice on the auction purchaser (r).

Imputed notice.—Imputed notice has been dealt with in the commentaries to explanation III.

Constructive notice.—The cases on constructive notice resolve themselves into two classes: first, where a party charged has had actual notice that the property has in some way been charged or encumbered: and where he has been held to have had notice of the particular charges or encumbrances affecting it and, secondly, where the Court has been satisfied that the party charged has designedly abstained from inquiry for the very purpose of avoiding notice. The proposition of law, upon which the former class of cases proceeds, is, not that the party charged had notice of a fact or instrument but that he had actual notice that it did so relate. The proposition of law upon which the second class of cases proceeds, is, not that a party charged has incautiously neglected to make inquiries but that he had designedly abstained from making inquiries for the purpose of avoiding knowledge, a purpose which if proved would clearly shew that he had a suspicion of the truth and a fraudulent determination not to learn it (s). It was held in the case of Hewitt v. Loosemore (t) that constructive notice is knowledge which the Court imputes to a person, from the circumstances of the case, upon a legal presumption so strong that it cannot be allowed to be rebutted, that the knowledge must exist though it may not have been formally communicated (u). In an earlier case this presumption was described as so violent that the Court will not allow even of its being controverted (v). It follows when a person closes his eyes to a single fact or procession of facts which he would have discovered had he made the usual inquiries or searches which he ought to have made or where but for his gross negligence in failing to follow up an inquiry or making an inquiry he would have known it. Further, constructive notice is affected apart from the case of principal and agent by registration as well as by possession. Notice must be in the same transaction (w). The doctrine of constructive notice ought not to be extended but confined within certain boundaries (x). It has gone to its full length and must not be extended and it has never been held that it is the duty of a proposed purchaser or mortgagee to inquire of every person who may be on the premises or any part of those premises. Nor has it been suggested that occupation of a part of the premises would put him on inquiry as to the possible rights of the

S. 3 occupier of that portion over the remainder of the premises (y). The Bombay High Court refused to extend the doctrine of constructive notice to a bank in which an executor and trustee opened a number of deposit accounts with corresponding current account to which interest was credited holding that there was nothing in the nature of his dealings with the bank to shew that he was using trust assets for improper purpose at the time (z). The tendency of modern decisions is unwillingness to apply the principle to companies or persons with knowledge of facts of which they had no knowledge whatever (a). This equitable doctrine is not applicable to commercial and mercantile transactions (b). In this country English decisions on constructive notice should be applied with care and only when the Court is sure that circumstances are similar. The doctrine of constructive notice is based on good sense, and is designed to prevent frauds on owners of property; but the doctrine must not be carried to such an extent as to defeat honest purchasers; and although this limitation has sometimes been lost sight of, still the limitation is as important and is as well known as the doctrine itself.

It is not the turning away from every information that amounts to constructive notice (c). The question whether seeing a window was notice was answered in the negative in Allen v. Seckham (d), where the dictum of Lord Chelmsford in Miles v. Tobin (e), that the existence of windows was constructive notice of a right of access to them, was not followed. That doctrine, as applied by the Vice-Chancellor, would come to this, that a purchaser is to be held to have constructive notice of every agreement relating to any structure which he sees on the adjoining ground. The case of Miles v. Tobin (e) was one in which the defendants had taken a lease of building land with knowledge that the same lessees had let other land to the plaintiffs for building purposes and that under that lease a building had been erected with windows overlooking the land taken by the defendants. The doctrine of constructive notice ought to be narrowly watched and not enlarged. Indeed, anything "constructive" ought to be narrowly watched because it depends on a fiction. Disputes having arisen between the plaintiff and W. whether a window in the plaintiff's house overlooking W.'s land was an ancient light an agreement was entered into between them whereby plaintiff agreed to keep the window opaque and make it open only in such a way that no person could look out of it. W.'s land was afterwards sold to the defendants who had no actual notice of the agreement but knew of the existence of the window. It was held that the mere fact of there being windows in an adjoining house which overlook a purchased property is not constructive notice of any agreement giving a right to the access of light to them (f). Where a person makes an inquiry and receives an answer which he may reasonably believe to be true, he is entitled to act upon it (g). In Malabar a person who takes a melkanam the term of which is to begin after the expiry of a kanam in force in favour of a third party must be held to have had notice of an agreement for renewal obtained by the kanamdar (h).

held in mortgage, but in his application for execution did not mention his lien on the property for the instalments that were still to fall due, the purchaser was held to have purchased the property free of the mortgagee's claim if he supposed that he was buying the full proprietary title (i). A contrary decision of the same Court proceeded on the theory of registration being notice (j).

Notice of a deed.—Notice of a deed has been held to be notice not only of its contents but of the facts the knowledge of which then insisting on its production would have necessarily led to (k). And this rule has been extended where the original deed was lost or destroyed and what purported to be a true copy was produced to the purchaser which subsequently proved to be defective inasmuch as a restrictive building covenant contained in the original deed was absent from the copy and the purchaser was held liable (l). In this case the purchaser had notice that the original was in existence and was aware of the provisions of the deed before he commenced to build. So also where a sale is subject to an agreement by the vendor to execute a mortgage the purchaser is bound by the terms which the vendor and mortgagee may agree to insert in the mortgage (m). A recital in a deed is notice of the contents of that deed (n). The true inquiry seems to be in every case whether the absence of the deed recited throws any reasonable doubt upon the title of the vendor (o). A general recital in a deed that there were mortgages on the estate, was held to affect parties claiming under the deed with notice on a mortgage not specified therein (p).

The recital of a settlement conveys notice of the will referred to therein (q). Even though the will be inaccurately recited in a conveyance the purchaser has notice of the real contents of the will (r). In the case of leases general notice to purchaser that there are leases is notice of all their contents (s). A leasehold title puts the purchaser on notice as to restrictions contained in the lease (t). A purchaser of leasehold has notice of ordinary but not unusual covenants in the original lease (u). And this rule is equally applicable to sales by auction (v). In case of an underlease the grantee has constructive notice of the original lease provided he has had a fair opportunity of ascertaining the terms (w).

In Patman v. Harland (x), Jessel, M.R., held that a purchaser or lessee having notice of a deed forming part of the chain of title of his vendor or lessor has constructive notice of the contents of such deed and is not protected from the consequences of not looking at the deed even by the most express representation on the part of the vendor or lessor that it contains no restrictive covenants nor anything

S. 3 in any way affecting the title. There is a class of cases of which Jones v. Smith (y) is most notorious, where the purchaser was told of a deed which might or might not affect the title and was told at the same time that it did not affect the title. That line of cases has no bearing at all on a case where you know that the deed does affect the land and the question as to the extent to which it does affect the land is to be ascertained only by looking at the deed itself (z). Where a mortgagee taking a mortgage in one of the towns mentioned in section 59 where he knows that mortgages by deposit of title-deeds were legal and usual and does not ascertain whether the title-deeds are already pledged there is such an abstention from an inquiry which he ought to have made or such negligence as to infer notice in terms of the section (a).

Wilful abstention from inquiry or search.—This is another form of constructive notice. It arises from disregard of information as where a person who has the means of knowledge of facts neglects to avail himself of them, it will be concluded as though he had actual knowledge. Means of knowledge is equivalent to knowledge (b). Knowledge must be available (c). A purchaser, which term includes a mortgagee or a transferee of a mortgage of land, will be deemed to have notice of all facts which he would have learned upon a proper investigation of title under a contract containing no restriction of his rights in that respect (d). Further, the observations of Lord Selborne in Agra Bank v. Barry (e), throw a considerable light on the question as to what is the duty which is cast upon a person to make inquiry or search the abstention from which amounts to notice. His Lordship observed that the duty, if there is a duty, is not a duty which is owed to the possible holder of a latent title or security. It is a duty merely which a person owes to himself and the non-observance of which, unless it is explained, affects his own bona fides. What is a sufficient explanation must always be a question to be decided with reference to the nature and circumstances of each particular case. But if there is not actual notice, and no wilful or fraudulent turning away from an inquiry into, and consequent knowledge of, facts which the circumstances would suggest to a prudent mind, then the doctrine of constructive notice ought not to be applied (f). The words "wilful abstention from inquiry and search" must be taken to mean such abstention from inquiry or search as would show want of bona fides on the part of the purchaser or mortgagee (g). A mortgagee who is informed that there are "charges" affecting the property, and is cognizant of two only, cannot claim to be a purchaser without notice of other charges, because he believes that the two, which satisfy the word "charges," are all the charges upon it. He is bound to inquire whether there are any others. The rule with respect to the consequence of a purchaser abstaining from making inquiries, does not depend exclusively on a fraudulent motive from such abstinence. When the circumstances of a case put a purchaser on inquiry, a false answer or a reasonable answer given to an inquiry, may dispense with the necessity of further inquiry; but where no inquiry has been made, it is impossible to conclude that a false answer would have been given if an inquiry had been made, or such as would have precluded the necessity of any further inquiry (h). A purchaser or mortgagee who does not investigate the title is affected with constructive notice of what he would have discovered on investigation although not of such matters as he would not have ascertained without going behind the documents of title themselves (i).

Where there is wilful abstention from inquiry or search it is not open to the plaintiff to plead section 55 (1) (a) of the Transfer of Property Act nor to charge the defendant with fraud within the meaning of the last paragraph of that section. The same result follows from the consideration of the sections relating to fraud and misrepresentation in the Indian Contract Act (j). The occupation of land by a tenant affects a purchaser of the land with constructive notice of all that tenant's rights, but not with notice of his lessor's title or rights. Actual knowledge by the purchaser that the rents of the land are paid by the tenants to some person whose receipt of them is inconsistent with the title of the vendor is constructive notice of that person's rights but mere knowledge that the rents are paid to an estate agent affects the purchaser with no notice at all (k). The Court will not apply the doctrine of constructive notice where the party seeking the benefit of that doctrine has been guilty of secrecy in the transaction with constructive notice of which he seeks to affect a purchaser (l). Such a case does not fall within the exception to section 19 of the Indian Contract Act. A mortgagee advancing money on the security of a considerable estate, and omitting to investigate the title to a particular portion of it, will not be affected with notice of equities affecting the residue of the estate, which upon such investigation he might possibly have discovered (m). This doctrine of constructive notice was also qualified by the Calcutta High Court where the owner after carving an estate numbered them 93 and 93A. An absolute sale of the former dated 11th April 1911, contained a recital of two encumbrances created by the vendor on 93A. A sale on 19th September 1911 of 93A contained a recital by the vendor that it was not encumbered by mortgage or otherwise, a statement contradicting the recital in the former conveyance. The Court held that the purchaser could not be said to have constructive notice of the encumbrances (n). The ground of the decision rested on the well-known principle enunciated by Lord Redesdale in Hamilton v. Royse (o) and quoted with approval by Smith, M.R., in Tressilian v. Caniffee (p). "If a man purchases an estate under a deed, which happens to relate also to other lands not comprised in that purchase and afterwards purchases the other lands to which an apparent title is made, independent of that deed, the former notice of the deed will not of itself affect him in the second transaction, for he was not bound to carry in his recollection those parts of a deed which had no relation to the particular purchase he was then about, nor to take notice of more of the deed than affected his then purchase."

Ought.—"Ought" here does not import a duty or obligation ; for a purchaser need make no inquiry. It means a matter of prudence, having regard to what is usually done by men of business under similar circumstances (q).

S. 3 Explanation 1.—The rule as to how far registration operates as notice has been laid down in explanation I added to the definition of notice under section 3, which addition has been made by section 4 of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, 20 of 1929.

Registration as notice.—Previous to the amendment above referred to opinions in India differed as to whether registration of a document under the Indian Registration Act was itself a constructive notice of the transaction affected by the instrument. The Madras (r) High Court uniformly held that registration was not notice and such has been the view of the Nagpur Courts (s). A contrary opinion was expressed by the Lahore (t), Patna (u), and Rangoon (v) High Courts.

The view of the Bombay High Court that registration was notice (w) was subsequently modified in a later case when it was held that registration did not necessarily give notice to anybody of anything unless the registered document was so indexed as would come to the notice of an inquirer anxious to know whether there were any documents relating to the property (x). The modified view was adopted by the Allahabad High Court (y). In the Calcutta High Court the decisions were not uniform, one line of decisions was that registration was not notice (z), while another line held that registration was notice (a). Yet a third view was expressed by the same Court, which held that whether registration was or was not notice in itself depended upon the facts and circumstances of each case and upon the degree of caution which an ordinary prudent man would necessarily take for the protection of his own interest by search in the registers kept under the Registration Act (b). On the matter coming up for determination before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council their Lordships approved the last view (c) which the Indian Courts subsequently adopted (d). To set this conflict at rest the Legislature has codified the law of notice.

What transactions are within the rule.—All transactions relating to immoveable property required by law to be and which have been effected by a registered instrument are within the rule. Constructive notice of a deed is constructive notice of its contents (e). The qualification as to unregistered instruments engrafted by the Bombay High Court (f) is not law now.

The date from which the notice operates.—Registration operates as notice from the date of registration or where property is not all situated in one district or where the instrument registered has been registered under sub-section (2) of section 13 of the Indian Registration Act of 1908 from the earliest date on which any memorandum of such registered instrument has been filed by any Sub-Registrar within whose sub-district any part of the property which is being acquired or of the property wherein a share or interest is being acquired is situated.

Who is deemed to have notice.—A subsequent and not a prior transferee is affected by registration. This is made clear by the words "any person acquiring." Hence payment by a mortgagor without knowledge of a registered sub-mortgage does not vitiate the payment (g). There is no duty on the part of a mortgagee to keep on searching the registers for further dealings of the mortgagor with the property comprised in his mortgage and a prior mortgagee cannot be said to have notice of subsequent encumbrances (h). Registration of a prior transaction is notice to a party entering into a transaction with respect to the same property on a subsequent date (i).

Mutation entry.—A purchaser who with ordinary care could have pursued his investigations beyond the point he did, cannot complain of fraud on the part of his vendor. Both under section 55 (1) (a) and the definition of "notice" in section 2 there would be want of care or a wilful abstention from inquiry or search (j).

When is registration notice.—Registration to operate as notice must comply with the following conditions:—

- (1) The instrument must be registered according to the Act and rules thereunder.
- (2) A memorandum of the transaction must be duly entered in books kept under the Act.
- (3) The particulars of the transaction must be correctly indexed.

Registration by mistake in a wrong book.—Non-compliance with the provisions of the Registration Act does not affect any immoveable property comprised therein (k). And on a failure to make a proper index in the registration office primarily due to the negligence of the mortgagee in giving proper description of the properties the subsequent purchaser was preferred to him (l). When there is such an error registration would not be notice according to provisos 2 and 3. The rulings of the various High Courts to the contrary are no longer law (m).

Error of procedure.—Registration of an instrument not duly stamped, contrary to section 35 of the Indian Stamp Act, 1899, is an error of procedure, not an act done without jurisdiction, consequently, if it is done in good faith the registration is valid under section 87 of the Indian Registration Act, 1908, and upon payment of the proper duty and penalty the instrument is admissible in evidence (n).

Explanation II.—The explanation is in accordance with the third illustration to clause (b) of section 27 of the Specific Relief Act, 1877, which authoritatively

S. 3 declares the law in accordance with the case of Daniels v. Davison (o), repeatedly acted upon, and the remark of Wigram, V. C., in Jones v. Smith (p), "that possession is prima facie evidence of seisin in fee." In India it is ordinarily a presumptive proof of title (q). Prior to this addition it was not clear how far possession was to be regarded as notice. Till then possession was considered as sufficient to put the would-be transferee on inquiry as to the title of such person. Dealing with the case of a tenancy, their Lordships of the Privy Council, in Barnhart v. Green-shields (r), observed, "in all the cases to which we have referred it will be observed that possession relied on was the actual occupation of the land; and that the equity sought to be enforced was on behalf of the party so in possession. There is no authority in these cases for the proposition that notice of a tenancy is notice of the title of the lessor; or that a purchaser neglecting to inquire into the title of the occupier is affected by any other equities than those which such occupier may insist on." That case is referred to and cited in a number of decisions of the High Courts in this country. The earliest decision of the Bombay High Court is Man-charji Sorabji Chulla v. Kongscoo (s), in which it was held by Chief Justice Couch that the English authorities on the question were applicable where a person bought an estate of which someone, not the vendor, had possession. The leading case cited was Daniels v. Davison (t), in which the doctrine of constructive notice was pushed to the extreme where the Lord Chancellor held, "that where there is a tenant in possession under a lease or an agreement a person purchasing part of the estate must be bound to inquire on what terms that person is in possession... that this tenant being in possession under a lease, with an agreement in his pocket to become the purchaser, those circumstances altogether give him an equity, repelling the claim of a subsequent purchaser who made no inquiry as to the nature of his possession." That principle was followed in Sharafudin v. Govind (u). Prior and subsequent decisions of the same Court have adopted the same long and undisputed principle (v). To the same effect is the view of the Patna High Court (w). According to the Calcutta High Court, occupation of property by tenant ordinarily affects one who would take a transfer of that property with notice of that tenant's rights and if he chooses to make no inquiry of the tenant, he cannot claim to be a transferee without notice (x). Such a transferee is liable to any equity which the tenant in occupation could raise against him; but he is not bound by notice of the lessor's title and he has no equity whatever (y). The Allahabad High Court has held, where an encumbrancer is in possession the fact of such possession is sufficient to put the would-be mortgagee on inquiry as to the title of such person (z). The Madras High Court has held that where it is proved that a subsequent encumbrancer under a registered conveyance had notice of a valid prior unregistered encumbrance and of possession by such encumbrancer or of such conveyance without possession the Courts are not bound to interpret the Registration Act so as to defeat the title of the prior encumbrancer (a). There is no duty to attend on the premises and examine narrowly every person (b) and the English decisions in regard to principle of constructive notice must be applied with care (c).

Constructive possession.—Constructive possession is not possession of such a nature as to be notice of a prior title (d).

Amendments.—Section 3 repeated the general principles of law enacted in section 229 of the Indian Contract Act. But this definition was found to be defective as the words “given to or obtained by his agent” suggested that the rule was restricted to the facts of which the agent had express notice (e) and the reference to the section of the Indian Contract Act did not extend the scope of the definition in section 3 of the Transfer of Property Act. This paragraph with the explanations was substituted for the original paragraph by section 4 of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, 1929 (20 of 1929). By the amendment the following words which followed the paragraph as it stands now were deleted, namely, “when information of the fact is given to or obtained by his agent under the circumstances mentioned in the Indian Contract Act, 1872, section 229.” These words have been omitted and the explanations have been added as to when a person is deemed to have notice of a fact by reason of registration or possession or the employment of an agent.

Explanation III.—Notice to agent in the course of business has the same effect as if it had been given to or obtained by the principal (f).

Notice to agent is notice to principal.—It is not a mere question of constructive notice or inference of facts but a rule of law which imputes the knowledge of the agent to the principal (g). In a later decision the same Tribunal while holding a minor's contract void observed that the money-lender was throughout the transaction absent from Calcutta and personally did not take part. It was entirely in charge of his attorney whose full authority to act was not disputed and who stood in his place for the purpose of the mortgage and his acts and knowledge were acts and knowledge of his principal (h). To affect the principal with constructive notice the agent's knowledge must have been derived in the particular transaction in hand; it must have been knowledge of something material to the particular transaction and something which it was the duty of the agent to communicate to his principal (i). Constructive notice is of two kinds. There is the notice through an agent which Lord Chelmsford in Espin v. Pemberton (j) had called imputed notice. The other is which Lord Chelmsford thought would more properly be called constructive notice, that kind of notice which the Courts have inferred against a person from his wilfully abstaining from making inquiry or inspecting documents. Where the mortgagor constituted his solicitor as general agent the knowledge of the solicitor must be imputed to him (k). A mortgagee is to be taken to have notice that there was a charge on the land leading him to make proper inquiries as to its character from the mortgagor (l).

Where a solicitor is employed by a mortgagee his knowledge is the imputed knowledge of his client (m). Evidence will not be admitted to prove that a solicitor did not in fact communicate his knowledge to the client (n). A solicitor employed by both parties in a mortgage transaction by whom it was not completed concealed from the mortgagee the existence of a settlement, notice was not imputed to him (o). So a purchaser who does not ask to have the title-deeds delivered (p), or if they also relate to other property, to have them produced (q), is deemed to have notice if they turn out to be in the possession of a stranger and of that stranger's rights, whatever they may be. It is quite immaterial whether the purchaser employs a solicitor or not (r). The above rule is, however, subject to certain limitations, viz., that the matter for which the agent was employed should be taken into consideration and it is necessary that the agent should be acting in the course of a particular business for which he was employed. This general principle will be found embodied in section 199 of the English Property Act, 1925. The doctrine of constructive notice imputing to the principal the knowledge of the agent cannot be extended to knowledge acquired by the agent prior to the agency being established. An auction purchaser completed his contract to purchase without notice of the depreciatory condition of the sale described by the mortgagee. It was observed that his employment of the mortgagee's solicitors subsequently to the contract did not affect him with constructive notice so as to upset a transaction of a date before the agency commenced (s). Again, if the agent had an interest which would lead him not to disclose to his principals the information which he has obtained, you are not to impute to his principals knowledge by reason of the fact that their agent knew something which it was not his interest to disclose and which he did not disclose (t); without considering earlier decisions it is sufficient to refer to the two cases of Cave v. Cave (u) and In re David Payne & Co. (v). In the former a solicitor, who was the sole trustee of a settlement, paid the trust money in the joint name of his brother and himself and used the fund in the purchase of land, which was conveyed to his brother alone. The property was then mortgaged in favour of a mortgagee for whom the trustee acted as solicitor; but it was decided that this fact could not affect the mortgagee with notice of the improper use of the trust money in the purchase of the estate. In the latter case, the director of a company induced the advance by them of £6,000 on the security of a second mortgage debenture in another company, with the intention of using the money for the purpose of forwarding a scheme in which he was personally interested, a scheme outside the scope of their business. No other director of the lending company knew anything of the circumstance. It was sought to affect the lending company by the knowledge which the director possessed. It was decided that no such knowledge could be imputed. The knowledge of the agent must have come to him in the transaction in which he was employed (w). When one person is an officer of two companies his personal knowledge is not necessarily the knowledge of both companies. The knowledge acquired by him as officer of one company will not be imputed to the other company unless he has some duty imposed on him to communicate his knowledge to the company sought to be affected and some duty imposed on him by that company to receive the notice (x). An employment of a solicitor in effecting an investment does not make him an agent to receive notice of subsequent encumbrances or dealings by cestuis que trust of that trust fund (y).

A principal cannot be imputed with knowledge of agent not acquired in the course of his employment (z) unless the agent has it at the time of his transaction with him (a) or acquired accidentally (b), or in a casual conversation (c) when there is no duty to communicate (d). Where it is certain the agent will not communicate (e) or tells the third party he will not communicate (f).

Concealment of fact.—Knowledge of agent is not to be imputed to the principal where the circumstances of the case shew that the agent intended a fraud which required the suppression of the knowledge from the principal (g). So also where a third party and agent conspire to conceal notice (h). The presumption which arises from the duty of an agent to communicate what he knows to his principal may be repelled by showing that whilst he was acting as agent he was also acting in another character, viz., a party to a scheme or design of fraud and the knowledge which he attained was attained by him in the latter character and therefore there is no ground on which you can presume that duty of the agent was performed by the person who filled that double character (i). Where an agent acts for an undisclosed principal and that fact is known to the agent of the other party the principal of the latter is affected by such knowledge (j). Where an agent is clothed with ostensible authority no private instructions prevent his acts within the scope of that authority from binding his principal (k). Where his authority depends, and is known to those who deal with him to depend, on written mandate it may be necessary to produce, or account for the non-production of that writing to prove the scope of his authority (l). If the same person is agent both for the vendor and purchaser or is himself vendor and agent for the purchaser, whatever notice he may have will affect the purchaser (m).

The doctrine of imputed and constructive notice discussed.—In Kettlewell v. Watson (n), this doctrine was discussed by Fry, J. That was a case which exhibited in a forcible manner the dangers to which purchasers of small plots of land were exposed in not investigating the title according to the regular forms of conveyancing. After stating the facts, his Lordship observed: "Constructive notice is of two kinds. There is the notice through an agent, which Lord Chelmsford called imputed notice. The other, which Lord Chelmsford thought would more properly be called constructive notice, which the Courts have inferred against a person from his wilfully abstaining from making inquiry or inspecting documents. S. 3 which the Courts have relieved against registered conveyances, or even against a prior legal title. The fraud may be in an agent, . . . or the fraud may be in the principal himself. The first question then which arises is, did the principal know of the charge? If he did not, had he an agent who knew of the charge? Then the next question is, was it the agent's duty to communicate that fact to the principal? If it was, the Court always holds that he did communicate it, not because, he did in fact communicate it, but because, it would be too dangerous to inquire whether the communication was really made; it would open the door to perjury. Having found then that the agent both knew the fact and communicated it to his principal, the next step is to inquire whether the principal did an act which was unconscientious, having regard to the knowledge which the Court so imputes to him? The Court, therefore, receives evidence of the agency, and it receives evidence of the act of the principal, but it will not receive evidence whether the agent recollected the fact at the time or whether he communicated it to his principal. It deals with those matters by way of irrebuttable presumption when the circumstances are known. This is Lord Chelmsford's imputed notice. The principle which applies to the other kind of notice is that which is said to be derived from the wilful shutting of the eyes to documents or to facts. That appears to rest really on the same principle, viz., that, if you see a man behaving in a way which shews that he desires to avoid knowing something, or having the knowledge of it brought home to him, then you conclude that he knew enough to make him desire not to have evidence of knowledge against him, and, therefore, it has been said there may be negligence which amounts to fraud. That language has always seemed to me not strictly accurate. What a man does through negligence he does not do from a fraudulent motive. Fraud imports design and purpose; negligence imports that you are acting carelessly and without that design. But what is meant is this—that conduct which might be negligent, or which might be attributable to negligence, is really attributable to a design not to know any more and is, therefore, an indication that you knew that of which you desired to avoid the evidence." There is another principle which undoubtedly is well established, and is an exception from the doctrine of imputed notice, that which is familiarly known by reference to the case of Kennedy v. Green (o). There, a solicitor was acting for both mortgagor and mortgagee and it was held that the presumption, which arises from the duty of the agent to communicate what he knows to his principal, may be repelled by shewing that, whilst he was acting as agent, he was also acting in another character. So in the case of a vendor and purchaser, where the latter employs the former's solicitor even though the purchaser be an infant and the sale under the sanction of the Court (p).

Gross negligence.—Negligence imports the neglect of some duty towards the person injured (q). It supposes the disregard of a fact known to the purchaser and may without a fraudulent motive be so gross as to justify the charge of constructive notice (r). "Gross negligence" or its convertible term "culpable negligence" sometimes called "wilful blindness" (s) is the same thing as negligence with the addition of a vituperative epithet (t). In Ware v. Lord Egmont (u), Lord Cranworth stated no definite rule as to what will amount to gross or culpable negligence can be laid down. "Where a person has actual notice of any matter of fact there can be no danger of injustice if he is held to be bound by all the consequences of that which he knows to exist. But where he has not actual notice, he ought not to be treated as if he had notice, unless circumstances are such as to enable the Court to say, not only that he might have acquired, but also that he ought to have acquired, the notice with which it is sought to affect him—that he would have acquired it but for his gross negligence in the conduct of the business in question.” That was the law laid down in Wyld v. Pickford (v) and upheld and recognized in the Exchequer Chamber in the judgment of Mr. Justice Crompton in Beal v. The South Devon Railway Company (w). The confusion seems to have arisen in using the word “negligence” as if it was an affirmative word whereas in truth it is a negative word; it is the absence of such care, skill and diligence as it was the duty of the person to bring to the performance of the work which he is said not to have performed. Therefore “gross” is a word of description not as a definition (x). In the same case, Erle, C.J., said: “I advisedly abstained from using a word to which I can attach no definite meaning and no one as far as I know ever was able to do so.” The question of liability for negligence cannot arise at all until it is established that the man who has been negligent owed some duty to the person who seeks to make him liable for his negligence. A man is entitled to be as negligent as he pleases towards the whole world if he owes no duty to them. Negligence, however great, does not of itself constitute fraud (y). Negligence is passive while fraud is active. Referring to the duties of directors in Lagunas Nitrate Company v. Lagunas Syndicate (z), Lindley, M.R., said: “Their negligence must be not the omission to take all possible care; it must be much more blamable than that; it must be in a business sense culpable or gross.” In his observations in Giblin v. McMullen (a), Lord Chelmsford has justified the use of the term “gross negligence,” tracing it as far back as Lord Holt’s celebrated judgment in Coggs v. Bernard (b). Lord Lindley, in Bailey v. Barnes (c), referring to the above cited passage in Ware v. Lord Egmont (d), stated that “gross or culpable negligence” in that passage does not import any breach of a legal duty, for a purchaser of property is under no legal obligation to investigate his vendor’s title. In the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Wigram in Jones v. Smith (e), the cases of constructive notice are reduced to two classes to which reference has already been made. The Conveyancing Act, 1882, really does no more than state the law as it was before, but its negative form shows that a restriction rather than an extension of the doctrine of notice was intended by the Legislature. It is carelessness of so aggravated a nature as to indicate an attitude of mental indifference to obvious risks (f). It cannot be evidence of fraud although no doubt the facts proved may be evidence of negligence or evidence of fraud. In Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Company v. Whipp (g), Lord Justice Fry observed that “the expression ‘gross negligence’ that amounts to evidence of a fraudulent intention is certainly embarrassing for negligence is the not doing of something from carelessness and want of thought or attention; whereas a fraudulent intention is a design to commit some fraud and leads men to do or omit doing a thing not carelessly but for a purpose.” The doctrine of equity upon which Jenkins, J., relied in Monindra Chandra v. Troyluckho (h), that gross neglect in section 78 of this Act means neglect that amounts to evidence

S. 3 of fraud as laid down in the cases of Evans v. Bicknell (i), Martinez v. Cooper (j), Farrow v. Rees (k), has not been approved or followed in recent cases and the true rule that regulates the postponement of "legal" mortgages in England was laid down by Lindley, M.R., in Oliver v. Hinton (l). His Lordship held that "to deprive a purchaser for value without notice of a prior encumbrance of the protection of the legal estate it is not, in my opinion, essential that he should have been guilty of fraud; it is sufficient that he has been guilty of such gross negligence as would render it unjust to deprive the prior encumbrancer of his priority." And the same was in substance stated to be the meaning and effect of the rule for postponement in this country on the ground of "gross neglect" as used in section 78 of this Act by the Calcutta High Court when that term came up for interpretation (m). Wilful departure to avoid knowledge of vendor's title or the earlier title-deeds (n) or that the title-deeds are with another (o) or whether they are with vendor who so asserts (p) or avoiding information obtainable by search of public records (q), wilful blindness to a vendor's lien apparent on the face of the deed (r) unless the vendor by acknowledgment of the whole purchase money voluntarily arms the purchaser with means of dealing with the estate free from every shadow of encumbrance (s), omission to inquire into the facts disclosed in the recital and deeds or whether there are tenancies or easements (t), or to investigate leasehold title for onerous (u) restrictive (v) covenants, or to inquire into the mortgagor's equity of redemption, or into the validity of transfer or to verify the abstract, which is no evidence of title, or whether the deeds are subject to surety bond, or that the vendor or mortgagor is under disability or the vendor being a guardian has failed to give security, are examples of gross negligence. Further, failure to examine earlier title-deeds (w), turning away from information that another is in actual possession is gross negligence (x), but not omission to investigate title of (y), or make inquiry as to access of light to the adjoining property (z), or to investigate deeds which are neither directly nor presumptively connected with the property (a). The defendant was the prior purchaser of an unrecognized portion of a bhag from their owner and entered into possession. The plaintiffs, who were subsequent purchasers of the whole bhag, were sued for possession from the defendant being purchasers without notice of the defendants' sale and having been assured by the owner and the talati that the defendant was the tenant, it was held that abstention from inquiry from the defendant was not wilful or gross negligence amounting to constructive notice in the absence of evidence that the plaintiffs deliberately refrained from going to the defendant because they doubted the information of the vendor and the talati

4. The chapters and sections of this Act which relate to contracts shall be taken as part of the Indian Contract Act, 1872 ;

Enactments relating to contracts to be taken as part of Contract Act.

And sections 54, paragraphs 2 and 3, 59, 107 and 123 shall be read as supplemental to the Indian Registration Act, 1908.

Enactments relating to contracts.—These are, according to section 4, to be taken as part of the Contract Act, 1872, but not vice versa. They are scattered over the Act, being such portions thereof as relate to transactions antecedent to actual transfer or to conduct vitiating a transfer or to the rights and obligations of the parties resulting on a transfer (c).

Alteration in the section.—The figures " 1877 " in paragraph two were substituted by the figures " 1908 " by section 5 of Act 20 of 1929. It will be observed that in the cases in which the controversy arose over the second paragraph " 1908 " was referred for " 1877 " even prior to the amendment therein. Such a reference was sanctioned by the General Clauses Act 10 of 1897, section 8.

The second paragraph.—This paragraph had no existence prior to 1885. According to the law as it then stood, while a transfer of immoveable property of a value less than Rs. 100 could be effected without registration, such a transfer by virtue of paragraph 3 of section 54 of this Act could only be by a registered instrument or by delivery of the property so that where a transaction was not effected by delivery, registration was compulsory while under section 17 of the Registration Act its registration was optional. To rectify this inconsistency this paragraph was added by the Amending Act 3 of 1885 making paragraphs 2 and 3 of section 54 supplemental to the Indian Registration Act, 1877. This amendment led to further discussion in the various High Courts as to whether the sections of the Transfer of Property Act enumerated in this paragraph fell within the comprehensive and stringent prohibition of section 49 of the Registration Act. The effect of the decisions of the Madras (d) and Allahabad (e) High Courts and of one of the Judges of the Bombay High Court (f) was that any unregistered deed of transfer of immoveable property below the value of Rs. 100 would not only not be effectual to transfer the property but would not fall within section 49 and could be admitted in evidence of the transaction. By clause (a) of sub-clause (3) of section 10 of Act 21 of 1929 section 49 of the Registration Act has been amended subjecting documents registrable under the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act under the same disability as those under the Registration Act. In the Madras case an unregistered lease for a period of less than one year, required to be registered under section 107 of the Transfer of Property Act but not under section 17 of the Registration Act, was admitted in evidence to prove the nature of the evidence under the instrument. Among the specified sections in this paragraph, section 123 requires that a gift of moveable property may be effected either by registered instrument or delivery while under section 17 of the Registration Act a gift of moveable property does not need registration. As applicable to mortgages the section does not in any way do away with the effect of section 59 which expressly provides that in certain areas a mortgage can be only by means of a written instrument (g), nor does it apply to a charge under section 100 (h).

“Dam-dupat.”—A rule of Hindu Law that the amount of interest recoverable at any one time cannot exceed the principal (i) though you may take any amount as interest by degrees. It does not apply when the debtor is other than a Hindu. It has nothing to do with any legality or illegality of any contract but it is rather a rule of limitation, which applies to all loans, whether unsecured or secured, on moveable or immoveable property (j). But the Madras High Court held that a claim for interest exceeding principal was maintainable after the repeal of Regulation XXXIV of 1802 and that as a rule of Hindu Law it was not binding in the mofussil since the passing of Act XXVIII of 1855 (k). It does not, however, apply where the mortgagee has been placed in possession and is accountable for profits received by him as against the principal and interest due (l), but where these profits are, by the terms of the bond, received for only a portion of the interest on the mortgage debt, the general rule of Dam-dupat will govern such mortgage accounts (m). The Act for the repeal of the Usury Laws (XXVIII of 1855) which deals exclusively with the rate of interest is not inconsistent with the rule in question (n). It is in force in the Presidency of Bombay (o) and in the town of Calcutta (p) but not in other parts of the Presidency of Bengal (q) on the ground adopted by the Madras High Court, where it was considered not binding, as aforesaid, and abrogated by the Transfer of Property Act (r), overlooking the provision of section 4 of the Transfer of Property Act taken with section 37 of the Contract Act (s). The principle is restricted to transactions where the contract is between Hindus (t). It ceases to operate if the original debtor ceases to be a Hindu by transfer or otherwise. In Bombay the original debtor alone need be a Hindu. But if the Hindu debtor's interest is transferred to a Mahomedan the stop is removed and interest which may have ceased begins to run again (u). Where the original debtor is a Mahomedan the rule does not apply though the original creditor be a Hindu not even if the debt be transferred to a Hindu (v). It was so held where the original mortgagor, a

OF TRANSFERS OF PROPERTY BY ACT OF PARTIES.

(A) Transfer of Property, whether moveable or immoveable.

S. 5 5. In the following sections "transfer of property" means an act by which a living person conveys property, in present or in future, to one or more other living persons, or to himself, or to himself and one or more other living persons; and "to transfer property" is to perform such act.

"Transfer of property" defined.

In this section "living person" includes a company or association or body of individuals, whether incorporated or not, but nothing herein contained shall affect any law for the time being in force relating to transfer of property to or by companies, associations or bodies of individuals.

Additions to the section.—In paragraph 1, the words "or to himself" were added by section 6 of the Transfer of Property Amendment Act, 1929 (20 of 1929), in order to make it clear that a transfer can be made by a person to himself as when he makes a settlement or trust in which he constitutes himself a trustee. Paragraph 2 has been added by way of explanation as to what is included in the words "living person" by the same section.

Transfer of property—its ingredients.—Is the purpose of an act by which

(a) Property is conveyed

(i) In present or in future

(ii) By a living person

(1) To one or more other living persons

(2) or to himself

(3) or to himself and one or more other living persons.

The definition of transfer of property given in the section includes a transfer purporting to be made by deed of appointment (y). In England it has been held that "property" and "power" are two distinct ideas and that "power" is not "property" within the meaning of that word as used in law (z).

Transfer of property.—An actionable claim constitutes property (a). It has been doubted whether the definition in the section applies to the term "transfer" used in section 130 (b). It is often used as a convertible term with "alienation,"

"conveyance," and "assignment," a distinction based on the tenure of the property. The word is used in its generic signification comprehending all the species of contracts which pass real right in property from one person to another (c). It does not apply to the Presidency Town Insolvency Act (d). The mere fact that documents of title were delivered does not either show or constitute a transfer of the property (e). The phrase excludes a partition according to the Allahabad High Court (f) though a contrary view is adopted by the Madras (g) and Calcutta (h) High Courts. An exchange under section 118 of the Act is a transfer of property but a compromise is not (i), nor is the creation of an easement (j). Similarly, recital of acts done (k) and entries in records of Survey or of the Municipality or the Police Department (l) do not supply the conditions of the law of transfer. The Bombay High Court has held that a legal presumption arose on the passing of the rajinama and kabuliyat that a transfer of ownership was intended to be effected and that accordingly it operated just as if it was a sale to extinguish the equity of redemption. The earlier cases (m) did rather go that way but later decisions took a contrary view (n).

Property.—There is no definition of this term in the Act. It includes both moveable and immoveable property. The enactment must be read subject to the interpretation required by the General Clauses Act, 1 of 1868. According to section 2, clause 34 of that Act, "moveable property" has been defined to mean property of every description except immoveable property and the latter, according to sub-clause 25, is said to include benefits to arise out of land and things attached to the earth or permanently fastened to anything attached to the earth. The Act itself in section 3 excludes from the phrase "immoveable property," standing timber, growing crops or grass. But section 6 dealing with the subject of transfer, excludes what according to the Act would not be property and thereby indicates what the enactment considers to be the meaning of property. Under English Law the main distinction is between real and personal property. "It is generally understood that those things are a man's property which are the object of ownership on his part The owner in possession of a thing has a right to exclude all others from the possession or enjoyment of it This right to maintain or recover possession is an essential part of ownership Ownership may be absolute or else limited or restricted. Absolute ownership would seem to include the right of free as well as right of exclusive enjoyment. . . . Another incident of absolute ownership is free power of disposition and it is essential to an absolute ownership that it should be of indeterminate duration. The word property is mainly used by lawyers (1) as denoting right

S. 5 of ownership, (2) as denoting the object of the right of ownership, and (3) as denoting valuable things . . . things which can be turned to money or assessed at a money value (o).” Further, English Law classifies property as consisting of corporeal or incorporeal things, a distinction observed in section 54 of our Act which refers to tangible immovable property or intangible thing. It also includes every interest in property in present or in future. In short, everything is included in this term other than those excepted in section 6 of the Act. The property must be in existence. Of future property there can be no transfer, but a contract to transfer property which is to come into existence in future is a valid transaction enforceable by Courts of Equity (p). In Collyer v. Isaacs (q), Jessel, M.R., remarked, “A man can contract to assign property which is to come into existence in the future and when it has come into existence, equity treating as done that which ought to be done, fastens upon that property and the contract to assign then becomes a complete arrangement.” The same view was taken where G. executed a lease in favour of J. and stipulated that J. was to defray costs of litigation for redeeming the property under lease and that if he succeeded in redeeming it, he was to obtain possession of it and was to pay rent to G. from the date of such possession, and it was held that such a document could not transfer the property leased but was only a contract to be performed in future and upon the happening of a contingency (r). The above view is supported by the decision of the Privy Council in the cases of Rajah Sahib Perhlad Sein v. Doorga Persaud Tewarree (s) and Ranee Bhobo Soondree v. Issur Chunder Dutt (t). Recently the Calcutta High Court held that in India hypothecation of moveables existing on the premises at the time and also of moveables which may be subsequently acquired and brought there is valid (u).

Living person.—These words are used as the transfer under the Act must be by a deed inter vivos and not by will. According to the section, both the transferor and the transferee must be living, which includes under section 13 a person not in existence at the date of the transfer. The explanation to the section further includes in the phrase a company or association or body or individuals whether incorporated or not. So does also “person” according to the General Clauses Act, 1897.

The Almighty is not a living person and a gift to Him does not require registration (v). Though an idol is considered by a fiction of law as a juristic person clothed for some purposes with rights of persons yet a juristic person is not a living person for all purposes (w). A Hindu idol is a “juristic entity.” It has a juridical status with power of suing and being sued (x). It is conceived as a living being and is treated in the same way as a master of the house would be treated by his humble servant (y). The provisions of section 123 of the Transfer of Property Act apply also to gifts through the intervention of a trust and therefore title in an endowment property passes to the idol which must be treated as a juristic person on the execution of the deed of endowment (z).

In Bhupati Nath v. Ram Lal (a), a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court, dealing with a Hindu will, held that the principle of Hindu Law which invalidates a gift other than to a sentient being capable of accepting it does not apply to a bequest to the trustees for the establishment of an image and the worship of a Hindu deity after the testator's death nor does it make such a bequest void. The Full Bench, after examining the Hindu texts and authorities, observed that according to strict Hindu juridical notion there can be no gift in favour of the gods for in the case of deities there cannot be any acceptance and therefore necessarily any gift.

In present or in future.—These words mean that the conveyance may be one which takes effect immediately on execution or at some distant date, that is to say, the interest of the transferee arises immediately on the execution of the document or at a date fixed by the parties. In Re. Mahomed Hasham & Co. (b), Marten, J., in holding that section 5 did not apply to the Presidency Town Insolvency Act, observed: "I am not absolutely sure what the words 'in present or in future' refer to. I should have thought grammatically they refer to property." In Shumsuddin v. Abdul Husein (c), Jenkins, C.J., remarked, "there is no definition in the Act of 'convey' or of 'property,' but it is to be noticed that a transfer means a conveyance of property not only in present but also in future.

Or to himself.—These words have been added by the Amending Act. Prior to the amendment, the words "Transfer of Property Act" had been defined in the section as to exclude a conveyance or delivery of property by a man to himself. The change has been made to enable a person to transfer property to himself as trustee on the execution of a settlement or trust of his own property (d). The authorities, however, prior to the amendment were against a person transferring property to himself as when he is a trustee or executor conveying property to himself as beneficiary.

6. Property of any kind may be transferred, except What may be transferred. as otherwise provided by this Act or by any other law for the time being in force.

(a) The chance of an heir-apparent succeeding to an estate, the chance of a relation obtaining a legacy on the death of a kinsman, or any other mere possibility of a like nature, cannot be transferred.

(b) A mere right of re-entry for breach of a condition subsequent cannot be transferred to any one except the owner of the property affected thereby.

(c) An easement cannot be transferred apart from the dominant heritage.

(d) An interest in property restricted in its enjoyment to the owner personally cannot be transferred by him.

(e) A mere right to sue...cannot be transferred.

(f) A public office cannot be transferred, nor can the salary of a public officer, whether before or after it has become payable.

(g) Stipends allowed to military, naval, air-force and civil pensioners of Government and political pensions cannot be transferred.

(h) No transfer can be made (1) in so far as it is opposed to the nature of the interest affected thereby, or (2) for an unlawful object or consideration within the meaning of section 23 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, or (3) to a person legally disqualified to be transferee.

(i) Nothing in this section shall be deemed to authorize a tenant having an untransferable right of occupancy, the farmer of an estate in respect of which default has been made in paying revenue, or the lessee of an estate under the management of a Court of Wards, to assign his interest as such tenant, farmer or lessee.

Amendments.—The amendments, additions and omissions made in this section are the following :—

Clause (dd) was inserted by section 7 of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, 1929 (20 of 1929). In clause (e) the words "for compensation for a fraud or harm illegally caused" were omitted by section 3 (i) of the Transfer of Property Act (2 of 1900). The words "air force" in clause (g) were inserted by section 2 of Schedule 1 of the Repealing and Amending Act of 1927 (10 of 1927). In clause (h) the words "for an illegal purpose" were omitted and the words "for unlawful object or consideration" within the meaning of section 23 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, were inserted instead of them by section 3 (ii) of the Transfer of Property Act, 1900 (2 of 1900). Clause (i) was added by section 4 of the Transfer of Property Act (1882) Amendment Act, 1885 (3 of 1885).

The section.—The section deals with what may be the subject of transfer under the Act. It proceeds on the maxim "expressio unius exclusio alterius" in that every property except those specified in the section may be transferred. The word property as here used includes interest in property. As already seen in section 5 under the caption "property" that only is a man's property which is the object of ownership on his part accompanied by possession or enjoyment of it to the exclusion of all others and giving him a free power of disposition. Where any one of the three ingredients are not absolute in their nature the usual term "property" used to denote the object or ownership is not used but the phrase "interest in property" is used, thereby connoting that the essential elements of property are wanting and that the right is restricted or limited in some sense, hence the right of a mortgagee in property is denoted by the word 'interest' in property. So also is the case of a lessee, co-sharer or co-owner or a Hindu coparcener or a Hindu widow whose right to maintenance is made chargeable on the property.

Code of Civil Procedure, 1908.—Section 60 of the Code gives particulars of properties not liable to attachment or sale. No sale can take place without an attachment but the decisions under this section of the Code cannot be appropriately applied in dealing with properties declared to be non-transferable under section 6 of the Transfer of Property Act. Much under the law cannot be sold in execution which is capable of being dealt with under a voluntary transfer (e). The prohibitions against attachment in section 60 of the Code and the prohibition against transfer in section 6 of the present Act rest on grounds of public policy. Prohibition against attachment so far as it relates to some properties mentioned in section 60 of the Code is not intended to interfere with the right of the owner to effect private alienations of those properties (f).

What is property.—According to Case Law the following instances of property may be quoted :—

The interest of a person's holding on which he has planted a grove (g). A Hindu religious endowment cannot be sold or permanently alienated though the income may be temporarily pledged for necessary purposes, such as repairs of the temple (h). A sale by Receiver of the property of an insolvent when his claim to it is in dispute is void (i). In the term "property" may be included a mortgagee's rights of his mortgagor (j). The equity of redemption (k), a lease from year to year, a hat, a vested remainder, a reversion expectant on the determination of a lease, a Hindu idol (l), a contingent remainder, an estate of an adopted son postponed during the life of the widow (m), vested right in income and contingent right in corpus of settled property (n). Right to receive offerings made at a temple independent of an obligation to render services involving qualifications of a personal nature is property (o). Remuneration which Maha Brahmins receive for services rendered at Hindu funerals is property (p). Offerings made at Mahomedan shrine (q) or in a Hindu temple unconnected with personal service is property (r). Right of worship is property but has not all the incidents of property (s). A distinction must be drawn between cases where emoluments are attached to a priestly office and where offerings are made to a deity and the persons who receive the same are not to render services of a personal nature as consideration for receipt of the offering. The former right is not ordinarily transferable while the latter is (t). A document by which a Hindu widow consents to give possession of the property to the reversioner is not

- S. 6 a transfer of property (u). Whatever is compulsorily registrable under section 17 of the Indian Registration Act, 1908, would be property. A mortgage of a chargee's rights is valid in law. The right to hold immovable property as security for repayment of a loan and the further rights corresponding to the rights of a mortgagee given to a chargee are property within the meaning of sections 5 and 6 (v). A deed of relinquishment does not confer a title and that title to land cannot pass by admission when the statute requires a deed and so parties cannot effect by release what could only be effected by a conveyance (w).

What may be transferred.—According to the general law all property is transferable under this section (x) unless there is some legal restriction to the contrary (y). Section 6 makes property of any kind alienable subject to the exception set out which cannot be supposed to be selected by reason of the future character of the chances. The truth is that an attempted conveyance of non-existent property may, when made for consideration, be valid as a contract and when the object comes into existence equity fastens upon the property and the contract to assign becomes a complete assignment. This was precisely the point of view of the Judicial Committee in Budhoo Singh v. Perhlad Sein (z). The principle underlying Holroyd v. Marshall and Tailby v. Official Receiver makes it clear that an instrument which purports to be a transfer of a chance or possibility mentioned in section 6, clause (a), can as such have no operation. Thus when an instrument of mortgage was executed by a person next in succession it was ruled that a mortgage suit could not be instituted against him after his succession (a). To the same effect was the decision in Nund Kishore v. Kanee Ram (b). Further illustrations of this principle may be found in the undermentioned cases (c).

Distinction between sections 6 (a) and 43.—Transfers which come within the purview of section 6 (a) are void ab initio and do not include the case of a person who transfers property which he erroneously believes to be his own. The latter transfers are governed by section 43 (d).

Interests vested or contingent.—In dealing with clause (a) the distinction between vested interest, contingent interest and spes successionis has to be noted. An estate or interest is vested as distinguished from contingent, either when enjoyment of it is presently conferred or when its enjoyment is postponed, but the time of enjoyment will certainly come to pass; in other words, an estate or interest is vested when there is an immediate right of present enjoyment or a present right of future enjoyment. An estate or interest is contingent if the right of enjoyment is made to depend upon some event or condition which may or may not happen or be performed, or in the case of a gift to take effect in future, it cannot be ascertained in the meantime whether there will be anyone to take the gift; in other words, an estate or interest is contingent when the right of enjoyment is to accrue, on an event which is dubious or uncertain. And as regards certainty, the law does not regard as uncertain the event of a person attaining a given age or of the death of somebody beyond which his enjoyment is postponed; because if he lives long enough the event is sure to happen. A spes successionis is merely an expectation or hope of succeeding to the property; a chance or possibility which may be defeated by an act of somebody else (e). Transfer of an estate vested (f) or contingent (g) or where it consists of a vested right in income and contingent right in corpus of settled property (h) is not obnoxious to the rule in this clause.

Clause (a)—Expectancies or Possibilities.

Heir-apparent.—An heir-apparent is one whose right to inherit is indefeasible provided he outlives the ancestor.

Legacy.—This is a gift by will of property. It may be general, specific or demonstrative (i). Residue is not legacy (j).

The chance.—Known to English Law as spes successionis, it is not capable of valid assignment and any purported assignment thereof operates only by way of covenant which will not be enforced in favour of a volunteer (k). A testator bequeathed a sum of money to his daughter for life and in case she died without issue for her next of kin. During the lifetime of the daughter her mother as presumptive next of kin, by a voluntary deed, assigned her expectant interest in reversion to the husband. Held, on the death of the daughter without issue, the assignment operated only as a covenant and being voluntary was not enforceable (l). A spes successionis is not a title to the property by English Law and confers no interest in property (m).

Bare expectation of future right.—There is a distinction between an interest that has arisen and is represented and an interest that has not arisen and that never may arise but with regard to which there is a remote possibility that the event which has not occurred, and upon which it is made to hang, may hereafter occur. The latter is not an interest, it is not a right, it is nothing more than a bare expectation of a future right. The expectation of a future interest, or rather of a future event that may give an interest, is not a thing which would justify a Court of Equity in entertaining a suit at the instance of a party having that and nothing more. A testator by his will bequeathed a legacy to a specified nephew on his marrying a specified niece of the testator to be held in trust for him and after his decease for his eldest or only child who should attain twenty-one, directing that if he did not marry the particular niece the bequest was not to take effect. The nephew married, with the testator's assent, a person other than the niece. He died leaving the nephew, nephew's wife and son of the nephew and also the named niece who was unmarried. Held, the possibility of the nephew marrying the niece was not sufficient to entitle the son to file a bill to have his share secured (n). The words "in expectancy" seem to have been taken from the Infants Settlements Act, 1855

Possibility.—At law a possibility could not be assigned though it might be released (p). A person attempting to deal with it has no present interest. He has an expectation of the possibility of a future event which if it occurs may give birth to an interest (q). Any other possibility of a like nature referred to in the section is a possibility of a nature akin to the two chances expressly mentioned. The possibility in clause (a) is “mere,” that is, a bare or naked possibility such as the hope of an inheritance entertained by the heir distinguished from a possibility coupled with an interest, such as a contingent remainder, executory devise springing or shifting use. The latter class may with propriety be denominated contingent interests, the former mere expectancies, inasmuch as a possibility coupled with an interest is more than a possibility and is a present devisable interest (r). While the expectancy of an heir-apparent during the lifetime of his ancestor is less than a possibility, being but a mere hope or anticipation. It is indisputable law that no one can have any estate or interest at law or in equity, contingent or other, in the property of a living person to which he hopes to succeed as heir-at-law or next of kin; during the life of such person no one can have more than a spes successionis, an expectation or hope of succeeding to his property nemo est hæres viventis. This doctrine is not peculiar to English jurisprudence. The right to receive offerings from pilgrims resorting to temples or shrines is inalienable because “the chance that future worshippers will give offerings is a mere possibility” (s). Where the right to receive offerings cannot be separated from the duty of officiating at the worship the law disfavours the transfer of such emoluments (t). An assignment of rent does not operate in respect of future possible leases that may come into existence as a result of renewal (u). The right of a vendor of immoveable property to the purchase money payable on execution of the conveyance is a mere possibility (v).

Offerings to a temple.—A sacerdotal office which belongs to the priest of a particular temple cannot be transferred (w). So also offerings from pilgrims resorting to a temple or shrine (x). Again, offerings made to a deity and appropriated by the officiating priest is not a right in which he is entitled to traffic (y). The Allahabad High Court, referring to the case of Puncha Thakur v. Bindeswari (z), observed that the offerings at a temple do not stand on the same basis as remuneration which Maha Brahmins receive for the services they perform at a Hindu funeral, holding that there is nothing in law to prevent a Maha Brahmin from mortgaging his right to offerings receivable by him in his personal capacity (a). In a later case (b) the same Court, following its earlier decision (c), drew a distinction between cases in which emoluments are attached to a priestly office and cases where offerings are made to a deity and the persons who receive the same have not to render services of a personal nature as a consideration for the receipt of the offerings, and held that emoluments of the former kind were not transferable while the latter were.

Agreement between expectants.—A fair agreement between expectants or their heirs to divide the property which might be left between them or to any one of them has been held not to be contrary to public policy and capable of being enforced in equity. In a case (d) before the Transfer of Property Act, a compromise deed was held not a conveyance of expectant right but an agreement between expectants to divide a particular property in a certain way on the happening of a particular contingency. This was mentioned with approval in a subsequent case (e) by the Allahabad High Court.

Hindu Law.—The interest of a reversioner does not constitute a present or vested interest in the estate which is completely represented by the female heiress, during her lifetime, with a restricted power of alienation. It is neither devisable nor transmissible by inheritance. Ordinarily he is an expectant heir with a spes successionis (f). If a reversioner proposes to relinquish his interest in favour of the widow, the widow's interest is not thereby enlarged, since the reversioner has nothing to relinquish (g). A transfer of an expectancy which has most frequently come before the Courts is a transfer by a Hindu reversioner. The exposition of the law in clause (a) will be found in an elaborate judgment of Mookerjee, A.C.J., in Annada Mohan Roy v. Gour Mohan Mallik (h) affirmed on appeal by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (i). That was a case for specific performance of the contract for sale executed by defendant on the 7th of May 1908 and confirmed on the 20th November 1909. The subject-matter was a share in an estate left by one G., the maternal uncle of the defendant, who died intestate on the 25th of May 1902 leaving two widows and five nephews (sister's sons) including the defendant. After the death of G., a will was set up which was pronounced a forgery by the Judicial Committee so that the estate left by G. vested in the two widows with the right of survivorship inter se. On the death of both of them the estate would pass to such of the nephews as were alive when the succession opened. Pending the litigation mentioned, the defendant agreed to convey for consideration to the plaintiff his interest in the estate of his paternal uncle, whether it was on the basis of the will or on the basis of his position as a reversionary heir. On the pronouncement above mentioned against the will, the defendant executed a supplementary agreement on the 20th of November 1900 to convey his interest in the estate of his maternal uncle whenever and howsoever which may vest in him. In consequence of diverse events which thereafter happened, the defendant obtained one-fifth of a half share of the estate of G., under a consent decree whereupon the plaintiff sought to enforce the agreement for sale of the 7th of May 1908, confirmed on the 20th of November 1909. His claim was resisted on the ground that it was void, illegal and unenforceable, as it was an expectancy. It was held that so long as the estate vested in a female heiress the interest of the reversioner was a mere chance of succession and could not form the subject of any contract, surrender or disposal. This view is now

S. 6 generally accepted in nearly all the High Courts (j) except in the Punjab, as hereafter stated.

The true position of a Hindu reversioner formed the subject of consideration by the Judicial Committee on more than one occasion during the last quarter of a century. He could not by Hindu Law make a disposition of or "bind his expectant interest" or his "future rights" (k). Following this, it was held that the interest of a Hindu reversioner expectant on the death of a Hindu female could not be validly mortgaged by him (l), and the contrary opinion expressed in Brahmadeo v. Harjan (m) must be regarded as overruled. The same view was reiterated by the Judicial Committee holding that this reversionary right is a mere possibility or spes successionis (n). In Janakai v. Narayanasami (o), Lord Shaw described the situation of the reversionary heirs as having those contingent interests which, though differentiated little if at all from a spes successionis, is recognized by Courts of Law having a right to demand that the estate be kept free from waste. Although entitled to appear and be heard in probate proceedings (p) he has no right or interest in presenti in the property. His right becomes concrete only on the demise of the female owner, until then it is mere spes successionis. It cannot be sold, mortgaged, assigned or relinquished for a transfer as a spes successionis is a nullity and has no effect in law (q). The prohibition in section 6 (a) being based on principle of public policy, the Court cannot allow such transactions to be affected by a consent decree unless in the meantime the succession opens and the reversion has fallen into possession and the reversioners in law are able to transfer their rights (r). It is true that the reversion is an expectancy but an expectant reversioner's right to sue for a declaration has statutory recognition (s). By becoming a party to a compromise (t) or family arrangement (u) and by taking the benefit thereof the reversioner may be estopped from claiming as a reversioner. A family arrangement to be valid need not necessarily be a compromise of doubtful rights or claims. The existence of a family dispute is not essential to the validity of a family arrangement (v).

It is of the essence of a family settlement that the deed presupposes a bona fide claim on either side and an honest settlement thereof. There must be either a dispute or at least an apprehension of a dispute, a situation of a contest, which is avoided by a policy of giving and taking (w). Hence the possibility of a Hindu reversioner succeeding to the estate of the last full owner on the termination of the estate of the intermediate female heiress falls within clause (a) of section 6. There is no escape from this position, nor can reliance be placed on the principles of equity which may be invoked by a transferee of non-existent future property as laid down in Holroyd v. Marshall (x), Tailby v. Official Receiver (y), Walsh v. Lonsdale (z) which reached this country in Mahomed Musa's case (a) and ultimately found its way into section 53A of this Act. That "equity regards that as done which should have been done." And a contract by a Hindu to sell immoveable property to which he is the nearest reversionary heir, expectant upon the death of the widow in possession, and to transfer it upon possession accruing to him is void; the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, section 6 (a), which forbids the transfer of expectancies, would be futile if a contract of the above character were enforceable (b), nor can the doctrine of estoppel enunciated in section 43 of the Act and which corresponds to the English doctrine of feeding the estoppel be relied upon. There is a fundamental difference between non-compliance with the formal requisites prescribed for a transaction whereby alienable property is transferred and an attempt to accomplish a transfer of property which has been rendered inalienable by a statutory provision nor can the doctrine of feeding the estoppel be made applicable to such cases as that principle has no application to a contract of assignment of property expressly rendered inalienable by the Legislature. The doctrine of estoppel being that if a man who has no title to the property, grants it and subsequently acquires an interest sufficiently to satisfy the grant, the estate instantly passes (c).

But the consideration for the transfer by a Hindu reversioner could be recovered on the agreement being discovered to be void under section 65 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, with interest from the date of the suit, the period of limitation not running until the rights of the purchaser were discovered to be unenforceable (d). Distinguished from a sale or an agreement to sell, a reversionary interest is the settled law that an alienation by a widow in excess of her powers is not altogether void but only voidable by the reversioners who may either singly or as a body be precluded from exercising their right to avoid it either by express ratification or by acts which treat it as valid or binding (e). The position of such a reversioner is in no way affected by the fact that a co-reversioner who had not consented to the alienation had sued for and obtained a declaratory decree in respect of half the property alienated by the widow (f). The case of Parvati v. Dayabhai Muncharam (g) could be distinguished. In that case the widow had transferred her life estate and the reversioner had transferred his reversionary rights. It was held that the reversionary right was not transferable. Moreover, the question of estoppel was

S. 6 not argued in that case. The case was subsequently explained and distinguished in Basappa v. Fakirappa (h). The Allahabad High Court (i) refused to follow the former case. The case of Gur Narayan v. Sheo Lal Singh (j) is also distinguishable. In that case a remote reversioner who had given his consent to a transfer by a widow was allowed to question the transaction not in his own capacity but as a legal representative of the actual reversioners who had not given their consent to the transfer. A consent even when given after the transaction would be operative (k) whether as an estoppel has been the subject of judicial comment (l). More recently the Courts have, on the ground of election, upheld a gift as against the particular reversioner who has consented to the gift by the widow during her lifetime. The authority of Bai Parvati's case (m) must be taken to have been still weakened by the decision of the Full Bench in Akkawa v. Syadkhan (n), affirming the principle in Basappa v. Fakirappa (o) not indeed on the ground of estoppel on which it actually proceeded but on the ground of election, referred to by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Rangasami Gounden v. Nachiappa Gounden (p). In the Full Bench case a Hindu widow sold her husband's property without legal necessity with the consent of the next presumptive reversioner as evidenced by his joining in the deed. The Court held that the reversioner could not, having regard to his election, impugn the validity of the sale after the widow's death. The Full Bench case was followed in a later case by the same Court (q). There a Hindu widow who had succeeded to the estate of her son made a gift of a portion of it to her daughter with the consent of the widow of another son in consideration of the daughter agreeing to maintain both the widows. After the death of the widow and the daughter the daughter-in-law sued to set aside the gift. It was held that the daughter was precluded by her own election from maintaining the suit. The same view in regard to election is taken by the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court.

As to whether creditors of a consenting reversioner can impeach his transaction is not covered by authority, but it is submitted that they cannot have a higher claim than their own debtor (r). Section 2 of the Transfer of Property Act provided that nothing in the second chapter shall be deemed to affect any rule of Hindu, Mahomedan or Buddhist Law but there is nothing in the Hindu texts that the interest of a reversionary heir is alienable. By the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, the second chapter is now made applicable to Hindus. As the Transfer of Property Act is not made applicable to the Punjab such a contract as a sale of a reversionary right will be enforced where the inheritance falls into possession (s).

Mahomedan Law.—Under the Mahomedan Law, a mere possibility, such as the expectant right of an heir-apparent, is not regarded as a present or vested interest, and cannot pass by succession, bequest, or transfer so long as the right has not actually come into existence by the death of the present owner. This principle of Mahomedan Law is uniform in its application to matters of bequest, inheritance or otherwise (t). There is a large preponderance of authority in favour of the view that a transfer or a renunciation of the right of inheritance before that right vests is prohibited under the Mahomedan Law (u). The rules of Mahomedan Law are not affected by the Transfer of Property Act though section 2 of the Act excludes the operation of this chapter to Mahomedans.

Punjab.—The Hindu Law and section 6 (a) of the Transfer of Property Act govern cases under the Punjab Customary Law as it is well settled that the respective rights of a widow in possession of her husband's estate and her reversioners are analogous under both these systems (v).

Alternative promise.—One of the parties to a transaction were reversioners and the other a mortgagee of their father claiming balance of the mortgage money and the agreement stipulated that on the death of the widow or on her executing a deed of relinquishment in their favour when they became owners of certain shares in three villages they would execute a deed of transfer in favour of the mortgagee. The deed provided that if for any reason they were not able to obtain proprietary possession of the shares in the three villages within a year after the death of the lady or in spite of obtaining possession they did not execute the sale deed, they would execute a sale deed in respect of a share in another property which they had on partition. It was held there were alternative promises, an option being given to the reversioners either to transfer their inheritance or to transfer their share which they had obtained on partition and the case was governed by section 58 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, which provides that in case of an alternative promise one branch is legal and the other illegal, the legal branch alone can be enforced and that as the first branch defeated the provisions of the law enacted in section 6 (a) the second branch was enforceable (w).

Clause (b) Transfer of a Right of Re-entry.

Proviso for re-entry.—Usually inserted in a lease though limited to non-payment of rent only where the lease is to contain "usual covenants and provisions" it is a right reserved to a lessor on the execution of a lease giving him a right to re-enter the premises leased and determine the lease by forfeiture resulting from the breach or non-observance of a covenant on the part of the tenant. It is one of the modes provided by section 111 for determining a lease of immoveable property on breach of an express condition which provides that on breach thereof the lessor may re-enter. This is further emphasized by section 114A, viz., that there must be a forfeiture incurred by the lessee and enforced by the lessor by due notice. Reading sections 111 (g) and 114A together, this right of re-entry can be exercised only by the owner of the reversion. In England only the legal owner of the reversion can exercise this right so that a mortgagor in possession subject to a lease has no right of re-entry for breach of the covenants of the lease (x). In a Bombay case there was a proviso for re-entry on breach of covenant. After a breach, the lessor assigned the lease to the plaintiff. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to exercise his right of re-entry. One of the learned Judges constituting the Division Bench held that the case was covered by the words of section 109 of the Transfer of Property Act while to the other it seemed that that section had no bearing on the point and that on general principles of English Law the right of re-entry could be exercised in case

S. 6 of a breach of covenant prior to transfer (y). A similar view was held by the Calcutta High Court in the case of a lease executed prior to the Transfer of Property Act (z). A right of entry always supposes an estate: for what is a right of entry without a right to hold and receive the profits. Therefore, if an estate is granted to a man reserving rent, and in default of payment a right of entry was granted to a stranger, it was void. A right of entry cannot subsist without an estate (a). A proviso for re-entry cannot be enforced unless there is a forfeiture clause.

Not a "usual covenant" in a lease.—A power of re-entry in a lease if the lessee or his assigns becomes bankrupt or makes a composition with his creditors is unusual and an intended assignee is not bound to accept the assignment of lease containing such covenant (b).

Re-entry on "non-performance" or "non-observance."—A power of re-entry on non-performance of covenants does not entitle the lessor to re-enter for breach of a negative covenant, such as a covenant not to assign without consent (c). While a power of re-entry for non-observance of covenant applies only to negative covenants (d). Prior to Harman v. Anislie (e), it was held that "non-performance" of a covenant applied only to positive covenants while "non-observance" to negative covenants. That case, however, decided that "non-performance" was appropriate to breaches of both covenants. A conveyance should, however, use both expressions to avoid complicity.

Notice inoperative to determine lease.—Actual re-entry or its equivalent, the issue and service of a writ to recover possession, is necessary in order to determine the lease. A notice is inoperative for this purpose. A notice by the lessor of his intention to re-enter and demand possession is not entry or equivalent to entry and is not sufficient to determine the lease (f). In an action to recover possession it is not necessary that plaintiff should in fact re-enter the premises (g).

Effect of proviso for re-entry.—It is well settled that on a true construction the proviso does not avoid the lease but renders it voidable at the option of the lessor. Consequently, if the lessor exercises the option that it shall continue, the lease is rendered valid; if he elects that it shall end the lease must be determined (h).

Requisite formalities to re-enter.—For mere non-payment advantage cannot be taken of the default in payment to re-enter. There must be, according to section 114A, a formal demand and the observance of other formalities.

Severance of reversion.—A severance of the reversion is distinctive of the power of re-entry but where two distinct properties held under separate titles are comprised in one lease and the reversion of one of them becomes vested in the lessee, this does not extinguish a right of re-entry in respect of the property of which the reversion remains in the lessor; the rules as to severance of reversion by assignment to third parties not being applicable to cases where a portion of the reversion is vested by assignment in the lessee himself (i). The latter is illustrated by the following case. H. demised a farm to certain lessees whose interest was vested in defendant. During the continuance of the lease H. died, and under his will the reversion was severed and became vested in several tenants in common, of whom plaintiff was one; held plaintiff could, without joining the other tenants in common, maintain an action to recover damages for wrongful acts causing injury to the reversion, and for breach of a covenant running with the land (j). See now the Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), sections 140-142.

Condition subsequent.—This is dealt with in section 31, the effect of which is that on breach of an expressed condition provided in the lease the lessee is deprived of his interest and the property reverts to the lessor.

Clause (c)—Easements.

Easements generally.—Two tenements are necessary for the existence of an easement and they must belong to different owners (k).

Transfer of dominant heritage.—Where a dominant heritage is transferred or devolves by act of parties or operation of law, the transfer or devolution, unless a contrary intention appears, must be deemed to pass the easement to the person in whose favour the transfer or devolution takes place (l). Hence an existing easement is not transferable, apart from the dominant heritage, and this is the rule in section 6 (c).

Creation of an easement.—The creation of an easement by grant is not such a transfer of ownership as is contemplated by section 54 of the Act. Where an easement is transferred it must be transferred along with the dominant heritage. There is no other way of transferring it and this arises by reason of the nature of the right. It exists only for the benefit of the heritage and to supply its wants (m).

“Profits a prendre.”—This class of beneficial enjoyment is not technically regarded as an easement in English Law, but the Easements Act includes this under easement. In the explanation to section 4 of the Easements Act (V of 1882), the expression “to do something” includes removal and appropriation by the dominant owner for the beneficial enjoyment of the dominant heritage of any part of the soil of the servient heritage or anything growing or subsisting thereon. Illustration (d) to that section mentions the right to pasture cattle on another’s field or to take water or fish out of another’s tank or timber out of another’s wood or to use, for the purpose of manuring his lands, the leaves which have fallen from another’s lands, as instances of easements. Where the plaintiff claimed and proved a prescriptive right of using certain land belonging to the defendant’s mortgagor for a part of every year for raising rice-plants to be afterwards transplanted to his own land, the right was regarded as an easement of the nature known in French Law as profits a prendre (n). And so is a prescriptive right of fishery (o). The right of “lagan” attached to the ownership of the front part of the “ghat” to use the back part under certain conditions is an easement (p).

Clause (d)—Transfer of Interest Restricted in Enjoyment.

Service tenures.—This clause forbids alienation of lands or interest in lands or of an office restricted in its enjoyment to the owner personally as there would be no security that the transferee would be a fit and proper person to discharge the duties attached to such land, interest or office. Illustrations of these are found in ghatwali tenures in Bengal, the office of karnam in Madras and religious offices. In Bengal a ghatwali tenure being ancient and of unknown origin, descended from father to son, and was held by hereditary right. In Moghul times such grants were common. Ghatwali duties may be divided into police duties and quasi-military duties. Though both classes have lost much of their importance, the latter in any strict form is very rarely rendered. Personal performance of the ghatwali services is not essential so long as the grantee is responsible for them and procures them to be rendered (q). For this purpose they were accustomed to employ armed retainers to guard against hostile inroads, as well as a general police force, under the description of thannadars, paiks and chowkidars to repress crime in the villages (r). Ghatwali tenures were not resumable on the Government assuming charge of the police (s). The office cannot, except by special custom, grant or other arrangement, either run with lands or be severed from them. If the lands are alienated piecemeal—and this must be involved in a right to alienate them all—the same difficulty arises in another form, for here, the office being indivisible, the question is to which of a number of several purchasers of the lands is it to pass? (t) A tenure so granted is inalienable and indivisible (u) and cannot be sold in execution of a decree against the person of the incumbent of the office of ghatwal for the time being (v). In Binode Ram Sein v. Deputy Commissioner of Sontah Parganas (w) it was held, and, in the opinion of their Lordships who heard Nilmoni Singh v. Bakranath Singh (x), rightly, that the surplus proceeds of a Birbhum ghatwali tenure which had passed by descent from ancestor to heir, were not liable, in the hands of the heir, for the debts of the ancestor. The jaghir is strictly a life tenure as far as the jaghirdar is personally concerned. He holds the land in lieu of pay. A newly elected jaghirdar would not be held responsible for the debts of his predecessor, as were he to be so, he would lose the benefit of his pay (y). Ghatwali is a combination of clauses (d) and (f), being public services rendered by a private individual. In the absence of special circumstances, a ghatwal is as a general rule, not competent to grant a lease of the tenure in perpetuity, and his successors are not bound to recognize such an encumbrance (z).

Future rents and profits which may become due to a ghatwal cannot be attached, for a ghatwal prevented from recovering the rents in future would not be in a position to pay the wages of the chowkidars and so to perform the duty which devolves upon him as a ghatwal (a). A receiver of future rents and profits may be appointed for such a receiver could make provisions for payment of wages and other incidental expenses. However, after deduction of all necessary outgoings from the total rents due to a ghatwal, the residue being his personal property, is as such liable to be seized and appropriated by his decree-holder (b). A tenant who has already acquired a right of occupancy in chowkidari chakran lands is protected by section 51 of Act VI of 1870 and such a right is not destroyed by the Bengal Tenancy Act (c).

In Bombay an alienation of service vatan land by the holder of it is good against himself unless the alienation is made to a vatandar (d). The subsequent abolition of the service renders the title of the alienee in possession undisputable by the alienor's heirs, assuming that there is no family custom operating apart from the law which preserves service lands for the intended uses (e). But though the political and public tie, which kept a vatan estate together, may thus have failed, a concurrent family custom producing an effect wholly or partly the same, may continue and may singly bind the hands of the successive holders of the property as strictly as before (f). It is only necessary to bear in mind that this "estate," the proprietary relation of a family to certain lands, is not by Hindu Law a quality of the lands; it is a jural character of the family (g). The daughter of a vatandar is not a vatandar of the same vatan during her father's lifetime (h). The fact that vatan land is attached to the office, deprives it of some of the incidents, which would attach to it if it were ordinary land in the possession of a Hindu family. According to the decisions of the Bombay High Court, the vatandar is entitled to alienate the land for the term of his natural life and his children, although not separate in interest from him, have no right to object to such alienation until after his death (i). Amongst Sudras governed by the Mitakshara an illegitimate son cannot inherit a vatan collaterally in preference to legitimate heirs. The right to sue for a declaration of heirship to a vatan does not accrue until the death of the widow of the last male holder of the vatan, the widow having a vested interest in it as the nearest heir (j). In Madras military service tenures were known as palayam. They were not inalienable. And none of the successive tenants could by his dealings deprive the next holder of the source from which his duties might be discharged (k).

Lands held on Swastivachakam service tenure are not subject to attachment in execution of a decree, for the sale of such land is opposed to public policy and the nature of the interest affected (l). The land which formed the emolument of the office of a karnam did not become the family property of the person appointed to the office although he may have had a hereditary claim to the office. The land was designed to be the emolument of the person in whose hand the office of the karnam might pass and was inalienable by him (m). A woman cannot hold the office of a karnam and when the immediate heir is incapacitated, the nearest male sapinda of the deceased karnam is entitled to succeed to the office (n). Deducible from the

- S. 6 above authorities is that freedom from service caused by commutation of money payment or abolition of military service, is destructive of the incident of inalienability of these service tenures (o).

Distinction between grant of office remunerated by use of land and grant of land burdened with service.—In the former case the land is prima facie, resumable, in the latter case it is not; but the terms of the grant or the circumstances in which it was made may establish a condition of the grant that it was resumable. The onus will be upon the grantor to make out such a condition (p).

“Res extra commercium.”—There are certain rights, chief among them being spiritual duties and privileges attached to a religious office, that cannot be transferred. They are res extra commercium, for instance, a sacerdotal office which belongs to the priest of a particular class. Similarly, a right to receive offerings from pilgrims resorting to a temple or shrine is inalienable. Whenever an image or idol is set up and consecrated there must be a shebait to serve and sustain the deity. His office is a sacred one and it does not follow, because in certain circumstances he may be entitled to alienate the temporalities of the deity, that in similar or any circumstances he is entitled to transfer the spiritual duties and privileges which appertain to his office (q). On the death of a husband his widow would take the shebaitship (r). Among the members of a Mitakshara family the right of shebaitship passes by survivorship (s). An alienation of a pala or turn of worship only, apart from the debutter land, is unreasonable in the absence of a custom established to that effect (t), nor is a sub-division of pala valid and a transfer by a shebait of his turn of worship to two persons in different shares is unreasonable (u). Being a point of law, objection to such a division may be taken in second appeal. A shebait is incompetent to sell his religious office for his own pecuniary benefit even if he sells to the person next in succession to the office (v). But the Privy Council has said that where custom relied on as sanctioning a transfer of their office and duties implies a right to sell the trusteeship for the pecuniary advantage of the trustees that circumstance alone justified the decision that the custom relied on is bad in law (w). The urallars or managers of a pagoda have no power to transfer their uramia right (x). A term of worship is not an interest in immoveable property (y) and therefore a sale thereof does not require registration (z). A right to receive offerings from pilgrims resorting to temples or shrines is inalienable (a). The privileges of a village priest to recover fees for the performance of religious ceremonies, no matter by whom they are performed, cannot be invaded (b). The office of a Maha Brahmin or Birtacharji is a right to perform personal service and not susceptible of transfer (c). Vritti, a “right of personal service” (d), is inalienable, being in essence a sacred and personal right (e). Under Hindu Law Vrittis are regarded as generally extra commercium (f). As to transfer of the right of management vested in the mahant of a mutt it is settled beyond controversy that such a transfer is beyond his legal competence. This principle is based on the ground that if the office to which is attached the conduct of religious worship and performance of religious duties were to be held transferable, the very object of the religious foundation might be defeated (g). An archaka (a priest who alone is allowed personally to attend upon the idol) cannot sell the emoluments of paricharika (assistant to the archaka not allowed to touch the idol) (h). An alienation by a pujari of his office is not recognized (i). Nor is a purchase of an office involving the performance of Hindu religious worship (j). A karima right in a pagoda is unsaleable (k). The office of an archaka in a temple could not be alienated where the alienation contemplated the introduction of a different ritual (l). The sale of religious trust is illegal (m).

There is a dictum by the Privy Council that although in the case of a family idol the consensus of the family might give existing dedication another direction, this could not be done in the case of a public temple by consensus of the trustees (n). Gift of a grant for grantee's parwarish for lifetime is invalid (o). An hereditary dharmakarta of a temple who has assigned his office to a zemindar and consented to a decree being passed on the footing of such assignment is competent, nevertheless, to bring a suit to set aside a Court sale of temple lands treating such assignment as nullity (p). A transfer of Malabar Devaswam, the right to manage a Malabar temple and its lands by way of lease for a sum of money, is illegal (q).

An alienation by the hereditary managers of the management and lands with which a religious foundation was endowed is void (r), unless an alienation is made of a hereditary office in favour of a person standing in the line of succession and not disqualified for the performance of the office by personal unfitness (s). The right of managing a temple, of officiating at the worship and receiving offerings at the shrine cannot be alienated (t). Property annexed to the office of kurnum is inalienable notwithstanding that for some time it may have been enjoyed as private property (u). The office of sajjada nashin or mutawali of a religious endowment or wakf cannot be transferred (v). Nor is the sale of a Mahomedan office to which are attached substantially the conduct of a religious worship and the performance of religious duties valid (w). An inam land held by a kazi in view of remuneration for his services is inalienable (x).

Transferability of palas.—There is no question that though probably religious offices were originally indivisible they are now deemed partible (y). Indeed, the very name pala or turn of worship shows that the right is partible. This involves by necessary implication the attribute of transferability as amongst the members of the family of *shebait*s. It is also devisable. It follows consequently that the customary right to make a sale, mortgage, gift or lease of a pala in favour of persons within a limited circle is closely associated with and possibly developed out of the heritable, devisable and partible character of a pala. A custom of this description cannot be characterised as unreasonable or opposed to public policy (z). Where by custom a right to perform pūja by turns was conferred on Brahmins only a transfer of such a right in favour of a non-Brahmin is not valid (a). A sale followed by agreement to reconvey amounts to a contract creating a personal right and is not transferable (b). An interest in the income of immovable property assigned by way of maintenance to a Hindu widow by members of a family is not capable of being attached and sold in execution of a decree against the widow (c). So also is exempted from attachment and sale land which is assigned for maintenance of a widow with a proviso against alienation (d). But a heritable right to receive a certain monthly allowance originally assigned in lieu of a share of landed property is not a mere right to maintenance or anything else exempted by the proviso to section 266 of the Civil Procedure Code and is saleable in execution of a decree (e).

Building leases.—A transfer may be prohibited by contract between the parties. Amongst examples of such contracts are building leases where land is agreed to be leased by the freeholder for a period of 999 years entitling a builder to a lease contingently on his erecting and completing specified buildings. Such agreements usually contain a clause that the lessee shall not underlet or part with or otherwise assign the benefit of the agreement without the consent of the lessor except by way of mortgage subject to the terms of the agreement. In the absence of a prohibition the benefit of a contract that is the beneficial right or interest of a party under the contract and the right to sue to recover the benefits created thereby are assignable provided that (a) benefit is not coupled with any liability or obligation that the assignor is bound to discharge, and (b) the contract has not been induced by personal qualifications or considerations as regards the parties to it (f).

Property under a contract which an assignor can pass to an assignee is an “actionable claim” within the meaning of section 3 of the Transfer of Property Act unless vitiated by fraud (g). When personal considerations form the material element of the contract it cannot be assigned without the promisor’s consent (h).

Pre-emption.—A right to pre-emption is a right of substitution (i) and is inalienable. It is not a repurchase and operates from the date of the sale in favour of the original purchaser (j). It is incident to the ownership of one land and a burden on the ownership of another land. On general principles the incident and the burden respectively will follow such lands (k). The sole object of the right of pre-emption is the exclusion of such strangers as are objectionable to the pre-emptive co-sharers of the vendor. It is purely a personal right which cannot be transferred to anyone except the owner of the property affected thereby (l). A decree for pre-emption cannot be transferred as the effect would be to place the transferee in possession without the trial of the question whether such a transferee had a pre-emptory right in preference to the purchaser against whom the decree was obtained (m). From its very origin and nature it is a transient right in its very conception and nature and being a personal privilege of the pre-emptor cannot be made the subject of sale or bargain of any other kind (n).

This doctrine of pre-emption is peculiar to Mahomedan Law and based upon justice, equity and good conscience. Applying this doctrine, a co-sharer in a village who had under the Wajib-ul-arz a right to the mortgage of a share in such village and in anticipation of obtaining the mortgage mortgaged such share to a stranger thereby forfeited such right (o). There is no objection to a pre-emptor being a Mahomedan and the vendor and purchaser being Hindus (p). The Hindus of Bihar have adopted the Mahomedan Law of pre-emption for a long time (q). Where the existence of the custom under which the Hindus have the same right of pre-emption under Mahomedan Law as Mahomedans in any district is generally known and judicially recognized it is not necessary to assert or prove it (r). There must be no delay in the assumption of the claim of pre-emption (s). There is no right to pre-emption where property is transferred in consideration of a partial release by a Mahomedan wife in respect of dower debt (t) or where a sale is made in exchange for the maintenance right (u) nor is there any right of pre-emption in case of an exchange (v) or mortgage (w) or perpetual lease (x) unless the annual rent is substantially equal to the Government revenue assessed and no right of re-entry is reserved (y). A relinquishment for consideration by the reversioner to the vendee of the widow of his right to sue to set aside the sale does not amount to a sale for purposes of pre-emption (z) but a sale of the bankrupt's property by the Official Assignee (a) or by the Official Receiver (b) is subject to the right of pre-emption and does not defeat that right. And a mortgage by a pre-emptor who had obtained a decree for possession of the pre-empted property, to a stranger to provide the pre-emptive price does not destroy his pre-emptive rights under the decree (c). Under Mahomedan Law, before it can be held that the sale is complete there must Clause (dd)—Future Maintenance.

Insertion.—This clause was added by section 7 of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, 1929 (20 of 1929), for the protection of maintenance to which qualified owners are entitled and to set at rest conflicting decisions.

Future maintenance.—The rule prohibits the assignment of future maintenance only in whatsoever manner arising, secured or determined. Arrears of maintenance may be assigned.

In whatever manner arising.—Maintenance of a Hindu widow may arise in several different ways, either as the widow of a coparcener in a joint family or as widow of the last male holder or it may arise under the will of a testator or by deed. Besides the widow, in Hindu Law other females are also entitled to maintenance. Under section 488 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, an illegitimate child is entitled to maintenance, and so in matrimonial proceedings is a wife entitled to alimony. Every father is under a legal obligation to maintain his child during minority.

Secured.—Maintenance of a Hindu widow is not a charge upon the property unless the charge is created by agreement between the parties or by a decree of the Court (e). Future maintenance so secured cannot be the subject of an assignment.

Determined.—Maintenance may be a personal right or may be fixed by agreement or by decree of the Court. Prior to the insertion of this clause the Calcutta High Court held that where future maintenance is merged in a judgment the right under the judgment is assignable (f). To the same effect was a dictum of the Bombay High Court (g). A Full Bench of the Madras High Court followed the same view (h). A contrary view was held by the latter Court where the right was personal (i). The conflict has been set at rest, for although an agreement or decree would make such a right definite this clause enacts that such a right, being nevertheless created for the personal benefit of the qualified owner, is inalienable.

Property in lieu of maintenance.—Where property has been given in lieu of maintenance the transfer of such property during the lifetime of the person entitled to maintenance is valid (j).

Allowances.—Where allowances are reservations out of the income of the estate to which a settlor is fully entitled they are his property and are not in the nature of maintenance grants personal to and inalienable by the holder of the allowances (k). Hereditary grant of an allowance of paddy out of the melvaram of certain land is not a right to future maintenance and is not exempt from attachment (l).

Surrender of life-interest.—Where a widow who had succeeded as heir to her husband's properties surrendered her life-interest therein to the nearest reversioner who in return agreed to her residing in the family house and sharing the meals of the family or to her receiving a certain amount of paddy annually if she chose to live away from the family house, the option being exercisable by her at her will and without her being subject to any liability to elect once and for all, it was held that the right to maintenance conferred on the widow was purely "personal" to her, and was not transferable (m).

Attachment.—Under section 60 (n) of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, a right to future maintenance is not liable to attachment or sale (n). An annuity given by will can be attached and sold as it is not a right to future maintenance (o).

Alienation.—A compromise by a Hindu widow with the reversioner in relation to her husband's property restricting alienation prevents her from having a disposing power and consequently the property cannot be attached (p). A mortgage by a Hindu widow of property transferred to her in lieu of maintenance for the period of her limited interest does not infringe the rule (q).

A deed of gift was made by a Hindu widow and her mother-in-law to the daughter of the latter in consideration of the daughter agreeing to maintain both the donors. The transaction was held to be a family arrangement binding upon the parties to it (r).

Alimony.—This is maintenance awarded against an erring husband and as such is a personal right of an aggrieved wife, consequently it is not alienable (s).

Residence.—The right of residence is not dealt with by this clause but it would be included in clause (d) as did maintenance prior to the amendment.

Babuana property.—This is property granted in accordance with the family custom of the Darbhanga Raj to the junior male members in lieu of maintenance subject to the proprietary rights of the grantor and his ultimate claim as reversioner on the extinction of the grantee's descendants in the male line. The grantee has a right to alienate the property subject only to the contingent interest of the grantor (t).

Kharch-i-pandan.—This is a personal allowance, and in the absence of any clear provision in the deed signed by the prospective husband, fixing the allowance in favour of his wife, that it was alienable, it could not be held so on the mere fact that the payment was secured by a charge on immoveable property (u).

Clause (e)—Mere Right to Sue.

Amendment.—This clause was amended by section 3 (i) of the Transfer of Property Act, 1900 (2 of 1900), by the omission of the words "for compensation for fraud or for harm illegally caused," thus making it wider than it originally stood.

Mere right to sue.—In the section the word "mere" means bare or naked (v). It is used in the same sense as in sub-clause (a). Prohibition against transfer in clause (e) is principally aimed at suits for recovery of mesne profits and damages arising either in tort or in contract. It is a personal right. A transfer of an actionable claim is not a transfer of a mere right to sue. A mere right to sue for breach of a contract is not assignable either under the Transfer of Property Act or

S. 6 under the Common Law even though the breach was in respect of the discharge of an obligation binding on the transferee (w). A sale by the Official Receiver of an insolvent's property of which he had never been in possession and which was of a nebulous nature is a mere right to sue (x) and so also a sale by the Official Assignee in insolvency of lands in possession of alienees from the insolvent are sales of the right to litigate and are to be deprecated, for even if they are not within this clause they are open to the same objection (y). A right to take accounts and to recover such sum as may be found due by an agent is not assignable, being a mere right to sue (z), but a right to recover an ascertained and definite debt from an agent is transferable (a), though in both cases there cannot be a purchase of a mere right to sue for accounts (b). The right of a co-sharer to profits against his co-sharer is alienable (c). Nor can an agent assign his right of indemnity before rendering accounts (d). The test of transferability is whether the inchoate right is attachable.

But where money is due by an agent or purchaser to his principal or vendor the claim of the latter may be attached and sold in execution of a decree against him although the amount of the debt is unascertained at the time (e). Interest on a debt due prior to the assignment is not transferable as it is a mere right to sue (f). A claim for interest by way of damages under section 73 of the Contract Act is a mere right to sue and cannot be transferred (g). There is no provision in the Contract Act for the recovery of earnest money. The remedy is merely one for loss or damage caused as on a contract broken under section 73 of the Indian Contract Act which benefit is merely a right to sue and cannot be transferred (h). Where a chitti containing a list of borrowed articles with their price was assigned it was held that the assignment was of a personal claim which could not be transferred. What was recoverable was money in the form of damages which after a breach is not an actionable claim but a mere right to sue (i). A claim to damages for use and occupation from a tenant holding over is a mere right to sue and not assignable (j). Nor can a mere right to sue for the remainder of maintenance allowance that may fall due in future be transferred (k). An assignment of rights under an executory contract for the future sale of immoveable property is not a mere right to sue, although a right to sue is involved in it on breach of its conditions (l). And a contract providing that the purchaser shall reconvey the property to the vendor for consideration if the vendor offered to purchase the same at the time stated and for the amount mentioned is enforceable by the assignee. It was not an incomplete contract the benefit of which could not be assigned to a stranger until the offer has been accepted by the tender of the price (m). Whether a claim for damages arising out of a breach of contract or in tort is a mere right to sue is a question to be decided on the facts of each case (n). A suit to enforce an agreement to lend money on a mortgage is not maintainable. Though it is open to the mortgagor to sue for damages for breach of the agreement to lend money he cannot transfer such a right. Hence an assignee of his for part of the consideration due for a mortgage not paid is not entitled to recover (o). But a personal right under a settlement is transferable (p) and so is a right to contribution (q).

Mesne profits.—A right to sue for mesne profits is not transferable (r) even though they be in the nature of damages (s). Mesne profits are unliquidated damages. It is not a claim to any debt or to any beneficial interest in immoveable property. Like other profits, 'mesne' are the difference between the amount realised and the expenses incurred in realising it (t).

According to the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, "mesne profits" mean those profits which the person in wrongful possession of such property actually received or might with ordinary diligence have received therefrom, together with interest on such profits, but shall not include profits due to improvements made by the person in wrongful possession. These words may be sub-divided into two parts. The cases distinguish between an assignment of an interest to which a right to sue is incident and the sale of a mere right to sue. The former is valid while the latter is not (u). Defendants 1 to 4 and one Aminabai were entitled to a certain property which was decreed to them on partition. Aminabai sold to plaintiff her one-fifth share with a right to recover mesne profits for four years from the defendants. It was held that a sale of land together with an incidental right to recover mesne profits attached to the property itself is valid. Section 6 (e) does not apply to such a sale (v).

The Courts of Calcutta (w), Allahabad (x), Patna (y) and Nagpur (z) have adopted the same view, viz., that the assignment of a mere right to sue does not convey any property but it would be otherwise if the property itself be transferred. The Madras decisions have not been uniform. It was there held that a transfer of claim for past mesne profits is invalid (a). Their soundness was doubted in a subsequent case by the same High Court (b). Again, a right to mesne profits accrued before sale cannot be transferred (c). Turning to the English cases they also emphasise the distinction between assignment of a bare right of action for damages and the sale of property with all incidents attached to it and uphold the validity of the latter (d), Seetamma's case and the earlier cases of the Calcutta (e), Allahabad (f) and Madras (g) High Courts were the result of an unnecessary close adherence to

- S. 6 the law of Torts in English Courts overlooking the distinction between a bare right to sue and a right only subsidiary to the enjoyment of the property itself. The Madras decision above referred to was to recover damages from an agent for being negligent in collecting rents and it was held that it was a mere right to sue within the meaning of section 6 (e). A transfer of a right to part mesne profits is invalid (h). Where a right to mesne profits has been declared by a decree but the exact amount has been left to be ascertained at a future stage in the same suit a transfer of such right is not invalid (i). Here the mesne profits are merged in the judgment before the assignment and the right under the judgment is assignable although the original cause of action is not. Transfer of property which is the subject of litigation is not a transfer of a mere right to sue (j).

Damages.—Damages follow on a breach of contract. The benefit of a contract is assignable (k). What is prohibited is the transfer after a breach of a right to sue for damages whether founded on contract or on tort. On breach of contract by the seller the purchaser who was entitled to claim damages transferred his right to recover the same to the plaintiff. It was held that the transfer was not of an actionable claim but of a mere right to sue prohibited by clause (e) of the section (l). And where after the seller's breach the purchasers became insolvent and the Official Assignee assigned the claim to one S.C., who again assigned it to the plaintiff who instituted the suit for recovery of damages, it was held that the assignment of a claim for damages for breach of contract after breach was not an actionable claim but a mere right to sue within the meaning of section 6 (e) and therefore not transferable (m). Both these were cases of unliquidated damages for breach of contract. A claim for unascertained damages for breach of contract is not assignable (n). Applying the last mentioned case, the Madras High Court held that a mere right to recover damages for negligence of an agent in failing to collect rent cannot be transferred (o). Where a claim is founded on tort it is well settled that the claim is not assignable (p). But where a broken contract gives right to specific performance a transfer of such a right is not opposed to law (q). Under the Code of Civil Procedure, section 60 (e), a mere right to sue for damages is not liable to attachment and sale and therefore there can be no assignment of a mere right to sue.

Actionable claim.—This is defined by section 3 of the Act and differs materially from a "mere right to sue." The former is attachable and can be sold in execution while the latter cannot. Actionable claim can be assigned while under this clause the assignment of a "mere right to sue" is prohibited. The definition of actionable claim was inserted by section 2 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1900 (2 of 1900). Where as a result of cross transactions of sale and purchase the total amount of difference in favour of the plaintiff No. 1 amounted to a certain sum and he assigned the right to recover the amount to plaintiff No. 2 in discharge of a debt due by him, the defendant's contention that the amount of differences was really damages for breach of contract and plaintiff No. 1 had merely a right to sue to recover the amount and the assignment to No. 2 was invalid under this clause was disallowed (r). On a transfer of land a covenant running with the land follows with it. A suit on such a covenant is not within this clause (s). Again, money due under a licence is not damages and may be validly assigned (t). Nor is a suit to recover money found due on taking of partnership accounts by the assignee of the partner founded on a mere right to sue but is an actionable claim (u). But where a partner having assigned his share to a stranger without the consent of his other partners, it was held that no immediate rights accrued to the assignee against the others. Such an assignment did not operate as an immediate dissolution of the firm nor has the assignee a right to call for an account of the profits. He has to accept the profit as agreed to by the partners. It is only when dissolution occurs that the right of the assignee arises to take action in the same way as his assignor could have done to claim an account as from the date of the dissolution (v). Here the Bombay High Court dissented from the view taken by the Calcutta High Court that the assignment operated as dissolution of the partnership and entitled the assignee to sue (w). This is in accordance with section 29 (i) of the Partnership Act, 1932, sub-section (2) of which enacts that if the firm is dissolved, or if the transferring partner ceases to be a partner, the transferee is entitled as against the remaining partners to receive the share of the assets of the firm to which the transferring partner is entitled, and, for the purpose of ascertaining that share, to an account as from the date of the dissolution. A claim to recover sums which the agent fraudulently omits to bring into account with the principal from the agent if he has collected them, if he has not, from the persons from whom they are due, is an actionable claim and not merely a right to sue and can be validly assigned (x). A transfer of rents due prior to the transfer of immoveable property does not fall under section 8 of the Act and clause (e) is not a bar to the maintainability of the suit (y) but a claim to damages for use and occupation from a tenant holding over is a mere right to sue and not assignable (z). And an assignment of rents cannot operate in respect of future possible leases that may come into existence as the result of a renewal.

A lessee covenanted to pay Government revenue and rendered himself liable in damages for breach of covenant. The lessor sold the property to the purchaser after the lessee had failed to pay instalments of revenue which was paid by the purchaser and deducted from the purchase price. Later the lessor executed a deed by which he assigned to the purchaser his right to recover instalments, appointing him an attorney to sue for them. It was held that the assignment was not a transfer of a right to sue but a definite sum of money and was a transfer of actionable claim under section 130 of the Act (a). An assignment of a debt uncertain in amount which will become certain when accounts are finally dealt with does not offend against the terms of clause (e) of the section (b).

- S. 6 Right of indemnity.—An agent who has a right of indemnity from his principal is entitled to sue upon it after rendering accounts, but not before he has accounted. It is a mere personal right to sue which cannot be assigned under section 6 (e) of the Transfer of Property Act (c).

Clause (f)—Public Office.

Public office.—In England the sale of public offices is governed by Statutes 5 and 6, Edw. 6. There is no definition of a public office in the Act, but a public office would be one held by a public officer. According to section 134 (5) of the Government of India Act, "office" includes place and employment. Under this clause a public office cannot be transferred. To make an office a public office the pay must come out of national and not out of local funds (d). A partnership agreement is not an assignment as to be void as infringing the Sale of Offices Act, 1551, and Sale of Offices Act (1809) (e).

Salary of a public officer.—This cannot be transferred whether before or after it has become payable. A public officer is defined in section 2 (17) of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908; under section 60, sub-clauses (h) and (i), the salary or allowance of a public officer is not liable to attachment and sale except as therein provided. A receiver appointed in a suit is a public officer (f). So also one appointed in insolvency (g). A Cantonment Committee (h), a British officer in the Indian Army (i), an officer in the Indian Staff Corps (j), are public officers. An assignment by a Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Madras of the sum to be paid to the "legal personal representatives" of such Judge not being payable during the lifetime of the Judge is not an assignment of salary, within the Sale of Offices Acts, 1551 (c. 16) and 1809 (c. 126) contrary to public policy (k).

Clause (g)—Stipends and Political Pensions.

Stipends to pensioners of Government.—Stipends allowed to military, air force and civil pensioners of Government are not transferable. The words "air force" were inserted by section 2 and Schedule 1 of the Repealing and Amending Act, 1927 (X of 1927). There is no mention of naval pensions in sub-clause (g).

"Pension" in section 11 of the Pensions Act, 1871, is a periodical allowance on account of past services or particular merits or as compensation to dethroned princes, their families and dependants (l) or periodical allowances made by Government on political considerations or on account of past services or present infirmities or as a compassionate allowance (m). Evidently "pension," "pay," or "allowance" are treated as all of them ejusdem generis, importing persons entitled to periodical money payments. The money paid to a retired military officer for the commutation of pension does not retain its character as pension so far as to prevent it from being taken in execution (n). A percentage received by a khot for collecting the assessment is not "salary," nor is such a khot a "public officer," within the contemplation of section 60, clause (h) of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908 (o). A personal covenant by a coroner to pay percentage of fees received at every inquest is not illegal (p). Bonus granted by the Government in addition to pension to an officer compulsorily made to retire on account of reduction in the public service is not a pension (q). Zemindari granted as a reward for services rendered to Government is not a pension (r). Immoveable property granted in lieu of pension is not a pension (s). A grant which purports to be a grant only of the royal share of the revenue given in commutation of cash is a grant of revenue only (t).

A grant of land revenue is not a pension (u) but it may take the form of an assignment of land revenue depending upon the circumstances of each case whether or not a particular assignment of land revenue is a pension (v). There is no prohibition against an assignment of a pension not granted on political considerations or on account of past services or present infirmities or as a compassionate allowance. The same Court, however, was divided in opinion as to whether a pension included a grant of land revenue (w).

Political pensions.—These are exempt from attachment under section 60, sub-section (g). A pension guaranteed payable by the Government of India by a treaty obligation contracted with another sovereign power is in the strictest sense a political pension (x).

A pension payable to a political prisoner by the Government of India under Regulation III of 1818 does not cease to be a political pension because the Government of India under some arrangement gets a foreign State to remit the amount to the Government Treasury for payment. But it falls under the Pension Act, XXIII of 1871. An agreement entered into by such prisoner with a creditor empowering the latter to withdraw the amount from time to time in discharge of his debt is void under the provisions of the Pensions Act as well as clauses (d) and (g) of section 6 of the Transfer of Property Act (y). Even though the political pension be unpaid at the time of the prisoner's death it is not liable to attachment. The character of the fund remained unchanged so long as it remained unpaid in the hands of the Government (z). There is no presumption that a jaghir is a political pension. The onus is on the person who alleges it (a).

Clause (h)—Transfer Opposed to Interest or Against Public Policy or to a Disqualified Person.

Sub-clause (1).—This clause is sub-divided into three parts. The first part forbids the transfer of an interest in property where the act of transfer is foreign to such interest, for example, lands held on Swastivachakam (service tenure) cannot be transferred as the sale of lands is opposed to the nature of interest affected (b). Land burdened with performance of service of a public nature is inalienable, as already seen in dealing with clause (d). Neither titles nor can medals and decorations be disposed of except according to regulations laid down by royal warrant (c).

- S. 6 Property settled on trust which does not contain a power of alienation cannot be transferred. A compulsory deposit in any Government or Railway Provident Fund shall not in any way be capable of being assigned or charged (d). And where property is transferred to a married woman or for her benefit on condition that she shall have no power during her marriage to transfer or charge the same or her beneficial interest therein cannot be transferred (e).

Primogeniture is a custom only and not a right (f). The rule of primogeniture which prevails in England is applied to impartible estates in India, some of which by custom have been held not to be alienable. In India succession to certain ancestral estates are governed by family custom according to the rule of lineal primogeniture. According to the law as understood prior to the decision in Sartaj Kuari v. Deoraj Kuari (g), an impartible Raj had been considered inalienable, but it was recognized in that case that the general rule thus established might be displaced by proof of family local custom restricting alienation; the onus of proving the custom being cast upon the person who alleged it. The trend of modern decisions is that the holder of impartible estates can alienate it by deed inter vivos (h) or by will (i). In the Madras Presidency a single family cannot, by not alienating property for a number of years, create a custom which would compel a Court to uphold that the property is inalienable (j).

Religious endowments in this country, whether they are Hindu (Devasathan or Sevasthan) or Mahomedan (wakf), are not alienable though their income may be temporarily pledged for necessary purposes (k).

Sub-clause (2).—This clause is a restraint on transfers for an unlawful object or consideration within the meaning of section 23 of the Indian Contract Act. The word ‘or’ between “consideration” and “object” as occurring in that section is disjunctive and not conjunctive. These two words are not synonymous but distinct in meaning. The word “object” means “purpose” (l). This clause has been discussed at length in section 25. Every agreement of which the object or consideration is unlawful according to section 23 of the Indian Contract Act, is void, but possession under a void agreement brings the transaction within the maxim “Pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis” and if the Court comes to the conclusion that the parties were acting together with a view to perpetrate a fraud and did in fact perpetrate that fraud and that there is no difference in the degree of guilt of the plaintiff who seeks redress and that of the defendant the duty of the Court is not to assist either party. In such cases the law favours him who is actually in possession (m). The above rule is subject to the exceptions laid down in section 84 of the Indian Trust Act, II of 1882. A further discussion on the subject will be found in section 53 of the Act.

Sub-clause (3).—This sub-clause prohibits the transfer to persons who are not competent to purchase property by any law or enactment in force. It is the converse of section 7 of the Act. Persons disqualified to be transferees are those enumerated in section 136 of this Act and O. 21, r. 73 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908. Although a minor is qualified to be a transferee such transfers are, however, confined to sales (n) and mortgages (o) and not to leases (p) which are after the amendment of section 107 by Act 20 of 1929 required to be executed both by the lessor and the lessee. Again, a person appointed as guardian of a minor cannot purchase property even under an order of the Court if he has failed to furnish the security required of him as a guardian. The disqualification does not extend to a transfer prohibited to a person not holding a certain certificate required to be obtained by him (q), nor does it attach to a Buddhist monk who may hold property such as paddy land (r).

Clause (i)—Other Non-transferable Interest.

Generally.—Clause (i) was added by section 4 of the Transfer of Property Act (1882) Amendment Act, 1885 (III of 1885). It lays down three exceptions to the general rule enunciated in the section that property of any kind may be transferred. Exception to clause (j) of section 108 is a reproduction of this clause. By reason of section 117 that exception cannot be extended to agricultural leases whereas this restriction would apply to such leases.

Exception (1).—This exception lays down that nothing in this section shall be deemed to authorize a tenant having an untransferable right of occupancy to assign his interest as such tenant. There are various local Acts the policy of which is to secure proprietary rights and all devices for the relinquishments of such rights are contrary to law and are illegal and void (s). An occupancy holding is a holding in respect of which there is an occupancy right. Whether a right of occupancy which is not transferable by custom or local usage is a right which can be transferred at all was considered by a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court which laid down that:—
In transfer for value of occupancy holdings apart from custom or local usage :

- (1) The transfer of the whole or a part is operative against the raiyat
 - (a) where it is made voluntarily
 - (b) where made involuntarily and the raiyat with knowledge fails or omits to have it set aside.
- (2) The transfer is operative as against a landlord in all cases in which it is operative against the raiyat, provided the landlord has given his previous or subsequent consent.
- (3) The transfer of the whole or a part is operative as against all other persons where it is operative against the raiyat (t).

In the same Court in a suit to recover joint possession of an occupancy holding in respect of his share by a co-sharer landlord on the ground that the defendant acquired no title by purchase as it was not transferable by custom and there was an abandonment of the holding by the former tenant the defence was that the plaintiff was not entitled to joint possession and that he could not get any relief

S. 6 except by bringing a partition suit. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to relief claimed and that the claim for joint possession without partition was maintainable (u). A mortgage of an occupancy holding is void in its entirety and no decree can be obtained on the personal covenant. To enforce such an agreement would be contrary to the provisions of sections 23 and 24 of the Indian Contract Act, IX of 1872 (v). The inclusion of non-transferable occupancy holding along with other properties which could be legally transferred did not make the whole transaction illegal (w).

Neither a relinquishment (x) nor a hypothecation (y) by an occupancy tenant of his holding is a transfer within the prohibition of section 9 of Act XVIII of 1873 (N.W.P. Rent Act), but a mortgage with possession is (z). The policy of the Oudh Rent Act is to keep the relationship of landholder and tenant subsisting in spite of either or both of them and it can be terminated only in the manner provided by the Act (a). On the execution of a usufructuary mortgage of a non-transferable holding and the abandonment of it by the tenant the landlord is entitled to treat the mortgagee as trespasser and to ask for his ejectment (b). As to sale of occupancy right with zemindar's consent a Division Bench of the same Court was divided in opinion (c).

Before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, a lease of homestead and was not transferable by law (d). It has been observed that although occupancy land is declared by the Agra Tenancy Act and by section 6 (i) of the Transfer of Property Act to be non-transferable, a transfer thereof is not expressly prohibited by law or declared to be otherwise unlawful within the meaning of sections 23 and 24 of the Contract Act or section 6 (h) of the Transfer of Property Act (e). It is respectfully submitted that the above observations are open to criticism.

Exception (2).—The clause forbids an assignment of an estate by a farmer who is in default in paying land revenue. Arrears of land revenue due on account of land by any landholder are a paramount charge on the holding and every part thereof and failure in payment renders the holding liable to forfeiture (f).

Similar provisions are available in the Revenue Codes of other provinces.

Exception (3).—The Court of Wards established by Legislative enactment is for superintendence and protection of persons and properties of minors and other disqualified proprietors of land. There are various Courts of Wards established for the several provinces of India. In the Bombay Presidency there is Act I of 1905 which extends to the whole of the Presidency except the City of Bombay and Aden. In Madras there is the Court of Wards Act, 1902, and in Bengal, Act IX of 1879 as amended by Act III of 1881 and I of 1906. In the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh there is the Court of Wards Act, IV of 1912, in the Punjab, Act II

A lessee of an estate under the management of a Court of Wards cannot assign his lease under section 6, clause (i) of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882. No ward is competent, without the sanction of the Court of Wards, to create any charge upon or interest in his property or any part thereof. Hence a surrender by two Hindu widows, disqualified proprietors under the Court of Wards Act, 1879, to reversionary heirs without the sanction of the Court of Wards, was declared void and the transaction was ineffectual to vest the property in them (g).

7. Every person competent to contract and entitled to transferable property, or authorized to dispose of transferable property not his own, is competent to transfer such property either wholly or in part, and either absolutely or conditionally, in the circumstances, to the extent and in the manner allowed and prescribed by any law for the time being in force.

Persons competent to transfer.

Persons competent to transfer.—The qualifications necessary for a transfer are :—

- (1) capacity to contract and
- (2) be entitled to transferable property or
- (3) authorized to dispose of transferable property not his own.

Such a person may transfer such property

- (a) either wholly or in part and
- (b) either absolutely or conditionally to the extent and in the manner prescribed by any law in force.

Limited estate holders.—Unless armed with authority to transfer a man cannot transfer property not his own (h) and where his estate is limited to the extent of his interest only. The rights of such estate holders are discussed below.

Administrator General.—By section 11 of the Administrator General's Act, III of 1913 (1), the Administrator General has power to sell property according to the directions of the Court. In default of such directions, according to the provisions of the Act on sale, he can enter into covenant against his own encumbrances. A grant of Letters of Administration of the estate of a deceased Hindu vests the property in him and enables him to dispose of immoveable property without the consent of the Court (i). Nothing in section 80 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, shall apply to any suit against the Administrator General in which no relief is claimed against him personally (j).

Official Trustee.—Section 7, clause 2 of Act II of 1913 (k), precludes an Official Trustee from selling immoveable property without an order of the Court. He has the same powers and is subject to the same control and orders as any other trustee acting in the same capacity. He is not an officer of the Court within the meaning

Executor or administrator.—Under the Indian Succession Act, XXXIX of 1925, the powers of an executor or administrator are subject to the following rules :—

(1) An executor or administrator is the legal representative of a deceased person and all the property of the deceased vests in him as such unless the deceased was a Hindu, Mahomedan, Buddhist, Sikh or Jain and such property would otherwise have passed by survivorship to some other person (n).

(2) No right as executor can be established in any Court of Justice unless Probate or Letters of Administration with the will annexed have been granted by a Court of competent jurisdiction in British India. This rule does not apply in the case of wills made by Mahomedans, and in the case of a Hindu, Buddhist, Sikh or Jain where such wills are of the classes specified in clauses (a) and (b) of section 57 (o).

(3) No right as administrator can be established in a Court of Justice unless Letters of Administration have first been granted by a Court of competent jurisdiction. This rule has no application in the case of intestacy of a Hindu (p), Khoja (q), Buddhist, Jain or Indian Christian (r).

(4) When probate is granted it establishes the will from the death of the testator and renders valid all intermediate acts of the executor as such (s).

(5) When probate has been granted to several executors and one of them dies the entire representation of the testator accrues to the surviving executor or executors (t).

(6) An executor or administrator has power to dispose of the property of the deceased vested in him either wholly or in part, in such manner as he may think fit (u).

(7) The power of disposal of an executor or administrator (v), in the case of a Hindu, Mahomedan, Buddhist, Sikh or Jain shall be subject to the following restrictions and conditions :—

(a) Such as may be imposed by the will unless the Court which granted the probate permits him by an order in writing notwithstanding the restriction to dispose of any immoveable property specified in the order in the manner permitted by the order.

(b) An administrator may not without the previous permission of the Court by which the Letters were granted

(a) transfer by sale any immoveable property vested in him under section 211.

(c) A disposal of property in contravention of clause (a) or clause (b) by an executor or administrator is not void but is only voidable at the instance of any other person interested in the property (w). An order giving power to sell does not include a power to mortgage (x).

(8) An alienation with permission is not absolute so as to exclude all inquiries in the question whether permission was obtained through fraud or misrepresentation. All the essential elements of the transaction must be placed before the Court before the sanction is obtained. Non-disclosure would entitle the Court to go behind such permission (y).

(9) If an executor or administrator purchases, either directly or indirectly, any part of the property of the deceased, the sale is voidable at the instance of any other person interested in the property sold (z).

(10) Powers of several executors or administrators may, in the absence of a direction to the contrary, be exercised by any one of them who has proved the will or taken out Letters of Administration (a).

(11) On the death of one or more of several executors or administrators, in the absence of any direction to the contrary in the will or grant, all the powers of the office become vested in the survivors or survivor (b).

(12) The administrator of effects unadministered, namely, an administrator de bonis non, has the same powers on a cessante grant as the original executor or administrator (c). Such an administrator is appointed either on the death of a sole executor or last surviving executor if there be more than one or on the death of an administrator when the estate at the time of such death is left unadministered.

(13) On discharge of funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and legacies an executor ceases to be an executor. His rights, duties and liabilities are those of a trustee (d).

(14) By section 2 of the Trustees Act (e) the words "trust" and "trustee" shall extend to and include the duties incident to the office of executor or administrator of a deceased person.

(15) On bankruptcy probate is not refused otherwise than when executor becomes non compos because that is a natural disability (f).

(16) Property held by the insolvent on trust for any other person is not divisible amongst his creditors (g). This rule extends to executors and administrators.

(17) The Court has jurisdiction to restrain a bankrupt executor from acting. Usually in such cases a receiver is appointed (h). A receiver is unnecessary where there is a co-executor who can and will act alone, when the other is restrained (i). In the absence of proceedings the bankrupt may continue to act on bankruptcy of one or two executors who are also trustees. It may be necessary for the plaintiff to take steps to remove the defendant as trustee and to have a new trustee appointed in his place.

(18) If a testator when he makes his will is aware of the circumstances and position of his executors and trustees the Court will not lightly interfere with their discretion; and although the circumstances of an executor being an insolvent may be a reason for appointing a receiver, yet, if the testator was aware of his

S. 7 insolvency, the Court will not on that ground alone take the property out of his hands (j).

Official Assignee.—On an adjudication order being made, the estate of the insolvent vests in the Official Assignee under section 17 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, III of 1909, and under section 28 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, V of 1920, in the Official Receiver. The former under section 68 and the latter under section 59 has power to sell all or any part of the property of the insolvent either by public auction or by private treaty (k). It is the duty of the Official Assignee to make the sale with all convenient speed. The Court's sanction is not necessary and the Court has no power to set aside a completed sale (l). It is submitted that in such a case relief may be sought in a regular suit. Conveyance of property sold by the Official Receiver in insolvency is not exempt from the requirements of section 54 (m) and unless guarded by express stipulation he is bound as other persons to make a good title (n). Conveyance by the Official Assignee is exempt from payment of stamp duty (o).

A sale by an Official Receiver without a vesting order is invalid (p) and confers no title on the purchaser (q). He is not an agent of the Court so as to enable the Court to ratify his act. A sale made by him before his appointment as receiver would be operative under section 43 of the Transfer of Property Act on his subsequent appointment as such receiver (r). An order of discharge either under the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act or the Provincial Insolvency Act, V of 1920, does not put an end to the insolvency proceedings and the power of sale can be exercised under the directions of the Court even after discharge (s).

An Official Receiver's sale by public auction is subject to the rules of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, in that behalf. A change in the sale proclamation on day of sale would be an irregularity vitiating the sale which may be set aside (t). It is not necessary that there should be mala fides on the part of the Official Receiver or the purchaser to warrant interference (u). The Calcutta High Court has held that the procedure for sales in execution of decrees under the Code of Civil Procedure does not apply to the Official Receiver (v). The property, moveable or immovable, acquired by an insolvent after the adjudication order but before his final discharge, can be transferred by him, provided the transaction is bona fide and for value and is completed before the intervention of the Official Assignee (w).

Receiver.—A receiver is appointed under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908. The powers conferred upon him are enumerated in Order 40, rule 1 (d) of the Code.

It is the practice to make an order vesting the property in the receiver and authorizing him to make the conveyance. Although the vesting order is made in almost all cases and required by conveyancers as necessary for the purpose of validating the title, it is somewhat difficult to understand on what law this practice is based, for the proper course is, when a receiver is appointed, that he should sell the property and the parties interested should execute the conveyance. With termination of the proceedings in which the receiver is appointed, the receivership comes to an end (x). A receiver of an estate may be either a private person or an Official Receiver. The powers of both are the same. In the case of private person, question often arises as to security. If he be offered to give security and the security is not completed the order is not effective and in spite of the order empowering him to sell he cannot sell without furnishing the requisite security (y). This rule applies when the order is conditional and not absolute in its terms (z). A receiver is a public officer within the meaning of sub-clause (b) and also (h) of clause 17 of section 2 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908 (a), so that under section 80 of the Civil Procedure Code he is entitled to the statutory notice before a suit is filed against him. The provisions of section 80 are mandatory (b). Even so as regards description and place of residence (c). The words of the section as to how notice is to be served are also mandatory. The plaint must contain the required announcement as to service of such notice (d). A receiver occupies a position towards an estate in his hands different from that of an executor and trustee (e). He cannot, without sanction of the Court, purchase property of which he is receiver (f). A receiver is an officer of the Court and not an agent for the party for whom he is appointed (g). The property is in the custody of the Court (h). No suit can be brought against him without leave of the Court which may be obtained subsequent to institution (i). He cannot sell property without the sanction of the Court. The sale may be by public auction or private treaty with the consent of the parties. On a sale by public auction he may fix a reserve bid. The receiver is often authorized to execute the conveyance by the Court. A receiver cannot delegate his powers (j). A defendant will not be permitted to question the propriety, regularity or necessity of his appointment (k). He cannot enter into any covenant other than the covenant against his own encumbrances. A purchase by a receiver of property of which he is appointed receiver would be set aside at the instance of the beneficiary but he would be entitled to a charge for the purchase-money and interest subject to which he would hold the property in trust for the beneficiary (l). A receiver's sale is sometimes subject to sanction of the Court. Such a condition does not entitle him to test the market.

Trustees.—By section 21 of the Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), contracts of trustees either in excess of their powers or in breach of their trust cannot be specifically enforced. The summary powers conferred by the Trustees Act (XXVII of 1866) may be exercised by the High Court in the case of Hindu trusts (m) as well

S. 7 as Mahomedans (n). Section 31 of the said Act is repealed by the Transfer of Property Act. That Act (o) consolidates and amends the laws relating to the conveyance and transfer of moveable and immoveable property in British India vested in mortgagees and trustees in cases to which the English Law is applicable. It defines immoveable property as extending to and including messuages, hereditaments and tenements, corporeal or incorporeal, of every tenure or description whatever may be the estate or interest therein, and trustee as extending to and including implied and constructive trusts.

A direction to dispose of an estate does not import a power to sell but to manage (p). Sale is not exchange. Power of exchange does not include a power of sale (q), nor does a power to invest, reinvest and lend (r). A trust for sale is not spent by the beneficiaries attaining vested interests (s), provided the power in its creation does not offend the rule against perpetuities and the cestui que trust have not put an end to the trusts by electing to take the property as it stands (t). The question, however, depends on the intention of the donor of the power (u).

Trustees must sell at the best price (v). Test of adequate price is not valuation but market value (w). When there was no evidence of market value a sale on the advice of auctioneers of repute was upheld (x). A sale may be by private treaty or public auction (y) and subject to a reserve (z) and either together or in lots and either at one time or at several times (a). For the purpose of completing any such sale a trustee has power to convey (b), but a trustee is incapable of exercising his power of sale or of executing a conveyance without an order of the Court. Trustees may sell trust property conjointly with property not subject to the trust (c). The circumstances under which the trustees of one property may join with the owner of another in selling both properties together was considered in the undermentioned case (d), where it was laid down that the duty of trustees who having a trust or power to sell joining with the owner of another property in selling both properties together was first to see that such a mode of sale was beneficial to their cestui que trust; secondly, to see their share of the purchase-money was apportioned before the completion of the purchase and to obtain payment of such apportioned share; thirdly, to apportion the share themselves, taking care to act under proper advice. The proper mode of apportioning the life estate and reversion when sold together for a lump sum is to value both interests separately and not to put a value on one and deduct that from the total price.

At the instance of a cestui que trust a purchaser would be restrained from completing a sale by trustees with depreciatory conditions inserted without any reasonable grounds. The smallness of the plaintiff's interest and the fact of his infancy are not reasons against granting an injunction (e). Trustees for sale put up certain land for sale by auction in lots which were sold "subject to the existing tenancies, restrictive covenants and all easements and quit rents, if any, affecting the same" and the purchasers were to indemnify the vendor against the breach of any restrictive covenants contained in the abstracted muniments of title. There were also certain general conditions restricting the occupation of the land. The abstracted documents contained no other restrictive covenants than those comprised in the general conditions and the vendors stated that they knew of no other restrictive covenants and of no existing tenancies, easements or quit rents affecting the property. Held that the conditions as to existing tenancies and existing covenants were depreciatory and the objection was a good defence to an action for specific performance by the trustees against the purchaser (f). Where a trustee is empowered to sell he may sell subject to a prior charge or not (g). On sale the only covenant that can be required of a trustee is that so far as his own acts are concerned he has not encumbered the property. On a covenant for production of scheduled deeds a trustee covenants to be personally liable so long as the deeds remain in his custody and for the purpose of binding those in whose custody they may thereafter go but not further or otherwise. Power of sale coming into operation on the death of a tenant for life is not exercisable with the concurrence of such tenant (h).

Where an authority to deal with the trust property is given to several trustees and one of them disclaims or dies, the authority may be exercised by the continuing trustees unless from the terms of the instrument of trust it is apparent that the authority is to be exercised by a number in excess of the number of remaining trustees (i). The English rule is the other way (j). An alienation for necessity by one without the consent of the other is not enforceable (k). Bona fide payment and receipt of purchase-money of a person to whom money is payable under an express or implied trust shall discharge the person making payment to see to its application or being answerable for its misapplication (l). Trustee for sale is prohibited from purchasing the trust property owing to his fiduciary character unless the trust is dissolved or the trustee and cestui que trust agree to stand in the relation of vendor and purchaser. This rule is general and extends to a secret or benami purchase by a trustee (m). Being in a fiduciary capacity a trustee cannot delegate his duties (n). When the instrument of trust is silent or there is an express prohibition as to sale, a trustee cannot sell and the sanction of the Court cannot be obtained, but there are exceptional cases, known as cases of "emergency," where in spite of prohibition or absence of any such direction the Court can in its extraordinary jurisdiction sanction the sale. Such jurisdiction is of an extremely delicate character and has to be exercised with the greatest caution (o). Such jurisdiction was exercised when the settlor never contemplated the possibility of a setback nor of municipal requirements necessitated by the property becoming extremely old and in need of repairs (p). It was also exercised on the ground that a refusal would subject the parties to a partition suit and a sale of the property by the Court which would be obviously injurious to the beneficiaries for at a Court's sale the property would hardly realize the price offered at a private sale (q).

Unless authorized by the instrument creating the trust a trustee cannot invest in purchase and when trustees have such power they cannot combine two trusts for the purchase of one immoveable property (r).

Vendor selling as trustee without power of sale.—A contract for sale stated that the trustee under the will of a certain deceased person was selling the properties under the trusts and powers vested in him thereunder and that the tenant for life would join for releasing her life-interest. On investigation it was discovered that the trustee had no power or trust for sale. The contract was, however, made by him at the request of the tenant for life and other beneficiaries, including himself, so that he could compel them to join. It was held that the vendor had shown a good title (s). But a trustee vendor who offered to procure a conveyance from the life tenant who was not bound to convey at his request (t) or offered the concurrence of beneficiaries after the time for completion had expired and long after the contract had been repudiated by the purchaser and the beneficiaries were not even then bound to concur (u), cannot be said to have made a good title. Where trustees under a will have power to sell with the consent in writing of a named individual, a prospective assent in writing to any sale which they may make will not enable them to enforce specific performance of a particular contract for sale (v).

Appointment of new trustees.—With regard to private trusts and trustees, provision is made in the Indian Trust Act, II of 1882. With regard to conveyances and transfers to which the English Law is applicable, provision is made in the Indian Trustees Act, XXVII of 1866, section 35, and those which follow. While in the Trustees and Mortgagees' Powers Act, XXVIII of 1866, which is enacted for the purpose of giving trustees, in cases where the English Law is applicable, powers as in settlements, provision is made in section 34 and those which follow.

Mortgagee.—A mortgagee can sell by public auction or by private treaty. A sale by him is governed by section 69 of the Transfer of Property Act and by contract between the parties. The only covenant that can be required of him is one against encumbrances. If a mortgagor joins in the sale for concurrence or confirmation he enters into the usual covenants for title given by a vendor, thus superseding his absolute covenants in a mortgage deed. A subsequent mortgagee is entitled to redeem under section 91 of the Transfer of Property Act. If once the prior mortgagee has acquired a right to sell and he enters into an agreement to sell in exercise of his power of sale, it is submitted that the subsequent mortgagee cannot come in and redeem. When the first mortgagee is not entitled to sell without notice to the mortgagor the purchaser is entitled to rescind if no notice has been given even though the mortgagor subsequently waives such notice for the mortgagor could not waive notice as against the subsequent mortgagees (w). The second mortgagee is not only entitled to such a notice but would be entitled to damages for default in giving such notice (x). But the notice by contract between the parties is in certain events dispensed with, in which case the mortgagee need not give the notice. Again, the mortgagee is protected by the clause making a sale valid notwithstanding irregularity or impropriety. Ordinarily when a mortgagee purchases a part of the equity of redemption, the integrity of the mortgage is broken and the parties interested in the other portions of the equity of redemption can redeem piecemeal, but where the mortgagee purchases a part of the mortgaged property at a sale free from all encumbrances, he can throw the whole burden of the mortgage debt on the remaining mortgaged property (y). A co-mortgagor is jointly liable though he receives no part of the consideration (z).

Partners.—Law of partnership in India is regulated by the Indian Partnership Act, 1932, according to which a partner has no implied authority to acquire immoveable property on behalf of the firm or transfer such property belonging to the firm (a). Further, section 8 of this Act is a bar to a partner transferring the partnership property. Although partners were joint owners there is no survivorship between them (b). By mutual consent partnership property may be sold. All partners must join in the conveyance. If some of them are dead the concurrence of the personal representatives of such of them as are dead must be obtained as death operates as a dissolution of the firm. There are several forms of habendum which may be adopted on a conveyance of freehold land to partners for partnership purposes. It may be to them as joint tenants without the addition of any words showing what the equitable interest of the partners are, it may be to them as joint tenants with the addition of words "as part of their partnership property" or "in trust for the partners as tenants in common as part of their partnership property." Or it may be to the partners as tenants in common either with or without the words "as part of their partnership property" (c). The powers of an individual partner under Indian Law are sufficiently doubtful to justify a purchaser in refusing to accept a release or reconveyance executed by that one partner only (d). Where a mortgage executed by a partnership firm on dissolution is substituted and for any reason found to be defective, there is always a presumption that the mortgagee intended to keep the prior mortgage alive for his benefit (e).

Drunkard.—This is dealt with by section 12, clause 3 of the Contract Act (IX of 1872) which enacts that a person who is usually of sound mind but occasionally of unsound mind may not make a contract when he is of unsound mind and illustration (b) to that section states that a sane man who is delirious from fever or who is so drunk that he cannot understand the terms of a contract or form a rational judgment as to its effect on his interests he cannot contract while such delirium or drunkenness lasts. Although the executant might have been drinking hard and may frequently have been of unsober and unsound mind yet it must be established that at the time when the deed was executed he was of unsound mind (f). A drunkard by his own act becomes non compos mentis (g).

Person of weak intellect.—Where a party to a contract is weak but has ample protection and independent advice and the other party is not shown to have taken any undue advantage of his weakness the Court will not extend its protection in favour of such weak party. Mere loss of vigour and infirmity on account of old age is not sufficient to invalidate a contract. With increasing old age there may come a time when there is a vacuity of mind, but all transactions made by the man

S. 7 prior to his mind becoming blank cannot be set aside. In cases of weak intellect the question may be looked at from the same point of view as in the case of a pardanashin lady (h).

Lunatics.—Lunatic means an idiot or person of unsound mind (i). An idiot is a person of unsound mind, incapable of understanding and acting in the ordinary course of life (j). A person is of unsound mind when he is not sufficient for the government of himself (k), though on inquisition he may not be found to be a lunatic (l). The true test is the existence or non-existence of delusion as delusion and insanity may be looked upon as convertible terms (m). A person suffering from delusions may perform acts not influenced by such delusions and when it is sought to set aside a transaction on this ground the Court must be satisfied that it was influenced by delusion (n).

The term unsound mind comprehends imbecility, whether congenital or arising from old age, as well as lunacy or mental alienation resulting from disease (o). Between imbecility and unsound mind there is a distinction without a difference (p). Loss of mental power arising from natural decay or paralysis or softening of the brain amounts to lunacy (q). The jurisdiction under sections 62 and 38 of the Lunacy Act, IV of 1912, are not concurrent and before a District Court can institute inquisition it must be satisfied not only as to the alleged lunatic's residence within jurisdiction but that he is not subject to the jurisdiction of the High Court (r). The Judge's functions cannot be delegated to an arbitrator or commissioner to make a report as to the alleged lunatic's state of mind (s). Before an inquisition is ordered under sections 38 and 62 there must be a thorough and careful preliminary inquiry and consideration of evidence including affidavit of applicant, medical certificate as to condition (t), and personal interview by the Judge with a view to ascertain the abnormality of the mind (u). The Act contemplates the question of lunacy or sanity at the date of inquiry and not when the alleged lunatic first became of unsound mind (v). According to section 2 of the Indian Trustees Act (w), a lunatic shall mean any person who shall have been found by due course of law to be of unsound mind and incapable of managing his affairs and a "person of unsound mind" shall mean any person not a minor who not having been found to be a lunatic shall be incapable from infirmity of mind to manage his own affairs. Section 12 of the Contract Act, IX of 1872, lays down rules as to what is sound mind for the purpose of contracting. The cases which may be included in the Contract Act, IX of 1872, are cases which are outside the Lunacy Act, IV of 1912, for when once it is established by inquisition that a person is a lunatic no further question arises of lucid interval or of sound mind at any stage until he is declared to be able to manage his affairs.

A sale at great undervalue from one afterwards found lunatic was set aside but the conveyance would stand as security for what was really paid (x). So also in the case of sale by a vendor of feeble intellect not absolutely incapable of managing his own affairs but in such a state of mental incapacity as to make it necessary that he should have protection (y). It is a fraud to obtain conveyance from an insane person long before a commission of lunacy issued and it should be set aside. Similarly, in case of purchase by lunatic the sale would be void, nor would the auctioneer be liable for any difference between the price obtained at that sale and the subsequent sale (z). In a case, however, where a person of unsound mind made a contract for purchase and subsequently on inquisition was found to be of unsound mind, a committee was appointed to complete the purchase (a). Here the direction to the committee to complete the purchase amounted to an election by the lunacy authorities to adopt the voidable contract.

A sale by manager of a judicially decreed insane Mahomedan is void and incapable of ratification (b). So also when a Hindu woman having a lunatic husband and minor sons and appointed guardian of the lunatic's estate alienated the family property such alienation was held binding as regards the minors but not as regards the lunatic (c). In cases of joint Hindu family the interference of the Courts is strictly limited to acts of the guardian as imperil the lunatic's interest; the Court has no power to interfere with the joint family property (d). The same principle applies to purchase by a lunatic as by a minor, namely, that the Transfer of Property Act does not prohibit a transfer to a person incompetent to contract. Lunacy proceedings are set aside under sections 60 and 82 of the Act. In order to avoid a contract on the ground of unsoundness of mind of one of the contracting parties it must be decided whether such a person was of unsound mind at the date of the contract which largely depends upon the inference to be drawn from the evidence (e). Where a person has been found lunatic by inquisition, so long as the inquisition has not been superseded but continues in force he cannot, even during a lucid interval, execute a valid deed dealing with or disposing of his property (f). When a person having contracted to sell his estate afterwards becomes a lunatic, the Court may, under section 51 of the above Act, order the manager to execute the conveyance if the Court thinks that the contract is such as ought to be performed. Again, the Court may, if it appears to be just or for the lunatic's benefit, order immoveable property of the lunatic, whether in possession, reversion, remainder or contingency, to be sold for any of the purposes mentioned in section 49 of the Indian Lunacy Act, and the manager of the lunatic's estate may execute all conveyances as the Court may order in the name and on behalf of the lunatic.

Joint managers.—Where there is no provision for survivorship in the order of appointment of joint managers the office of the survivor terminates on the death of his co-manager (g).

Minor's sale.—A minor means a person who, under the provisions of the Indian Majority Act, 1875, is to be deemed not to have attained majority. The Privy

- S. 7 Council has held that a minor's contract is void (h). A contract for sale of immoveable property being a contract that a sale of such property shall take place on terms settled between the parties (i), it follows that a sale by a minor is void. The same decision is an authority for the proposition that under section 41 of the Specific Relief Act, I of 1877, the Court may, on adjudging the cancellation of an instrument, require the party to whom such relief is granted to make compensation to the other (j). But the purchaser was held not entitled to the return of his purchase-money where no fraud was practised by a vendor and the purchaser could have ascertained the age of the vendor by due diligence (k).

A minor may ratify on attaining majority, as by acceptance of the surplus left after satisfying a decree against him (l). A minor for whose benefit a contract was entered into by his de facto guardian is entitled to sue upon it (m). He may repudiate by sale, on attaining majority, to a third person (n). So also may his heir (o). The plea of invalidity of a sale by a minor's guardian is available not only to the minor on coming of age but also to the transferee (p). Where there was no equity restoration was refused (q). The jurisdiction of the Indian Courts in regard to the appointment of guardians for infants is derived from the Guardian and Wards Act, VIII of 1890. Where a guardian has been appointed by will or other instrument his power to transfer by sale immoveable property belonging to his ward is subject to the restriction imposed by the instrument; unless he has been declared a guardian under the Guardian and Wards Act, VIII of 1890, and the Court which made the declaration permits him by order in writing notwithstanding the restriction to dispose of any immoveable property specified in the order in a manner permitted by the order (r). The right of a guardian appointed by the Court to transfer by sale the property of his ward is limited and is subject to the previous sanction of the Court (s). A disposal of immoveable property by him in contravention to the above provisions is voidable at the instance of any other person affected thereby (t). A sanction of the Court given in 1896 could not validate a sale in 1906. This was held where a Hindu died leaving a widow and two minor sons. The widow was appointed guardian in 1890 and in 1891 obtained sanction of the Court for sale of half the property of the minors. In 1906 a sale of less than half the property was effected by the widow and one of the sons who had attained majority (u). Nor can a widow appointed guardian of the person and property of her two minor sons effect a sale of joint family property by joining her eldest son who was a major as the interest of a member of the joint family was not individual property (v). A pardanashin lady may be appointed guardian of a minor's property (w). An Official Trustee cannot be appointed guardian of the property of a minor (x). The power of a manager or de facto guardian to alienate the estate of an infant is under Hindu Law both limited and qualified. It can only be exercised in case of legal necessity which under certain circumstances means benefit to the estate (y). In so doing the Courts considered they were following the decisions of the Privy Council (z). A contrary view was, however, taken by the Madras High Court in Narayanan v. Ravunni (a) and by the Bombay High Court in Limbaji v. Rahi (b), nor is such power possessed by a manager or de facto guardian in case of a Mahomedan (c) or Indian Christian (d) or Buddhist (e) and their sales are void. A Full Bench of the Bombay High Court, after a review of the Case law, held that it would not be accurate to say that no transaction could be for the benefit of a minor which was not of a character to protect or preserve the property of the minor. The sale of land which cannot conveniently be cultivated with other property of the minor, and the investment of the purchase-money in lands which could be so conveniently cultivated; or the sale of lands in order to raise money to secure irrigation or permanent improvement of the other lands of the minor; or a beneficial exchange; or a sale in order to prevent destruction of the minor's property, are transactions which would be for the benefit of the estate.

The mother and guardian of a Hindu minor sold for Rs. 900 a small strip of land normally worth not more than Rs. 600. The purchase-money was invested by the mother in the money-lending business which had been carried on by the minor's father and was at the date of the sale carried on by the mother. The minor on attaining the age of majority sued to set aside the sale. Held by the Full Bench that the sale in question could not be justified as being for the benefit of the estate (f). A Division Bench of the Bombay High Court has held that a person who purported to sell an infant's property was not in fact a de facto guardian but a guardian ad hoc (g). In this state of authorities the question came before a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court as to whether under the Hindu Law a de facto guardian of a minor can validly sell his property to a third person for legal necessity. The two underlying facts that he was a de facto guardian and there was legal necessity were assumed. The majority held that he could, overruling Limbaji Rowji v. Rahi (h). The dissenting judgment of the Chief Justice was that he could not and that his position was not analogous to that of a manager of Hindu joint family, pointing out the strangeness of the conclusion resulting therefrom, that power should be annexed to an office held without authority which would not be so annexed if the office were held under legal sanction. A so-called guardian de facto is not a guardian at all but is merely a person who has assumed, without authority, to act as guardian and it is a strong thing to hold that by such assumption

§. 7 he has acquired the right to deal with the minor's immoveable property (i). Alienation by Mahomedan brothers on behalf of a minor brother is not binding on the latter nor is such an unauthorized transaction bettered by describing them as de facto guardians. In the latter capacity they may assume important responsibilities but they cannot clothe themselves with legal power to sell. The sale must be under the authority of an appointment by the Court (j). Where a minor is, however, a member of a joint Hindu family, no guardian can be appointed under the Guardian and Wards Act of his undivided interest as the interest of such a member in the joint family is not individual property (k). But a chartered High Court has power to appoint a managing member as guardian of such interest with power to alienate the same (l). The Guardian and Wards Act specially preserves pre-existing powers possessed by a chartered High Court (m). An alienation by a guardian of a minor with the sanction of the Court can be relied on by the alienee unless the latter has been a party to a fraud or collusion or guilty of underhand dealing (n). The fact that the order granting sanction has not recited, as required by section 31 (2) of the Guardian and Wards Act, the necessity for the loan, does not render the sanction invalid. Such a defect is a mere irregularity. The Court must be taken as having adopted the grounds set forth in the petition and affidavits though not reproduced in the order (o). Where the order was cancelled by the Court subsequently, the order of cancellation having had no connection with the validity of the debt itself, but the money was advanced by the lender while the order was in existence, held, that the lender was still entitled to rely implicitly on the order (p). But where a guardian appointed under the Guardian and Wards Act makes a transfer of the minor's property without obtaining the permission of the District Judge, the latter has no power to cancel it in the sense that the transfer becomes inoperative by force of that order. Any question as regards the validity of the transfer is to be determined by a competent Court in a regular suit (q).

A private alienation though confirmed by the execution Court under O. 21, r. 83 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, is not validated if such alienation is made by a certificated guardian and the transaction is not confirmed by the Court which appointed the guardian. The inquiry under section 29 of the Guardian and Wards Act is for the benefit of the infant while under the Code of Civil Procedure it is for the protection of the execution creditor, though such a transaction is liable to be avoided in proper proceedings under section 30 of the Guardian and Wards Act, it can, however, be only on the principle that he who seeks equity must do equity and the person seeking to avoid the transaction must be prepared to reimburse the purchaser whose money has benefited the infant (r). The Court, while granting permission to a certified guardian of a minor to transfer the minor's property, can impose conditions on the guardian. A distinction must be drawn between condition precedent and a condition subsequent imposed on the guardian. Non-compliance with the former will vitiate the transfer. The same cannot be said with regard to the latter unless there is something in the order granting permission casting an obligation on the transferee of that property to do some act subsequent to the execution of the deed of transfer in his favour. The only duty cast upon the transferee by law is that he must satisfy himself that the order sanctioning transfer has been strictly complied with upto the time of the execution of the deed of transfer and that no condition precedent imposed by the order has been violated (s). On a sale by a guardian with the sanction of the Court :—

- (a) Apart from any covenant personally binding the guardian he is not liable in damages if the purchaser is deprived of the whole or part of the property in consequence of the sanction of the Court found to be invalid.
- (b) Covenants in the deed executed by the guardian as such should be considered covenants binding on the minor if such covenants are valid.
- (c) Merely because the guardian acts on behalf of the minor he does not incur any vicarious liability on the failure of the transaction by reason of the Court's sanction being held to be ineffective.
- (d) If the guardian has agreed expressly or by necessary implication in his personal capacity wholly apart from his capacity as guardian of the minor to indemnify the purchaser he would be personally liable (t).

A guardian appointed by the Court is required to give security. Till such security has been completed, he is not a guardian so that if a guardian appointed by the Court has not given security a transfer made by him would be void. In the absence of any directions in the order a guardian must furnish security. Under Rule 453 of the Rules of the High Court of Bombay a person appointed guardian shall, unless otherwise ordered, first give security. A minor's guardian cannot be compelled to give covenants for title, as no guardian can render a minor liable (u).

Minors' agreement for purchase.—Neither the guardian of a minor nor his manager is competent to bind the minor or his estate by contract for the purchase of an immoveable property and as a minor is not bound by the contract there being no mutuality he cannot, on attaining majority, obtain specific performance of the contract (v).

Purchase by minor.—As regards sale in favour of a minor the Madras High Court held, on the authority of the Privy Council (w), that imposition of liabilities by section 55 of the Transfer of Property Act involved the notion of competency to contract and as it was impossible to conceive of a sale without a reciprocal promise, past or concurrent, there could be no legal sale in favour of a minor (x). The view of the Allahabad High Court is that nowhere in the Act is it provided that a minor is incapable of being a transferee of the property and, moreover, section 127 of the Transfer of Property Act by necessary implication shows that the person who is not competent to contract may be a donee of immoveable property, therefore a minor in whose favour a valid deed of sale is executed is

S. 7 competent to sue for possession (y). A gift, however, is not the result of contract between the donor and the donee. A Full Bench of the Madras High Court, deciding that a mortgage in favour of a minor was valid (z), overruled its previous decision (a). The state of the law on the subject is unsatisfactory. In case of sales of freehold as well as leasehold a vendor enters into covenants for title. When a purchaser is a minor, with whom is he to enter into these covenants? Again, in the case of leasehold the purchaser of leasehold property enters into a covenant that he will regularly pay the rents and observe the covenants of the lease and indemnify the vendor against any breach thereof. How can a minor enter into such a contract? In this connection reference may be made to section 7 of the Act which enacts that every person competent to contract and entitled to transferable property or authorized to dispose of transferable property not his own is competent to transfer such property. Further, section 6, clause (h) (3) enacts that no transfer can be made to a person legally disqualified to be a transferee. The word "transferee" is nowhere defined in the Act. Again, every sale is the result of a contract between a vendor and purchaser.

Estoppel.—As regards the doctrine of estoppel, it has been held that section 115 of the Evidence Act does not apply to infants (b). But the Bombay High Court has held that where there is a false and fraudulent representation as to age the minor is estopped (c). The same view has been adopted by the High Courts of Allahabad (d) and Calcutta (e). The Privy Council has laid down that this rule of estoppel does not bind a minor (f). This was followed by a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court (g) overruling its previous decisions (h) approving the decision of the Madras High Court (i). On a sale by a guardian of a minor the purchaser cannot insist upon covenants for title except as against his own encumbrances (j). In England sales and purchases by infants are regulated by special legislation such as the Infants Relief Act of 1874 and the Settled Land Act of 1925.

Custody of minor.—If a minor is in the actual custody of another person with the permission of the guardian he is deemed to be in the constructive custody of the guardian (k).

What "guardian" includes.—The term "guardian" in the Act has been used in a wide sense. It does not necessarily mean a guardian duly appointed or declared by the Court, but includes a natural guardian or a de facto guardian. A father is the natural guardian of his minor son (l).

Residence of guardian.—It is not necessary that the proposed guardian should be resident within the jurisdiction of the Court (m).

Willingness of guardian.—The willingness of the proposed guardian need not be intimated by a signed and attested declaration (n).

Covenant to repurchase.—A contract of sale by a guardian on behalf of the minor containing a covenant to repurchase if the vendee desires to sell is not a standing offer but a completed contract unenforceable by either party for want of mutuality (o).

Joint tenants.—Their holding is to all others except themselves as one single owner. Inter se they have separate rights which are equal in all respects, it not being possible for one of them to have a greater interest than another in the subject of the tenancy. It is distinguished by unity of possession, unity of interest, unity of title, and unity of time at the commencement of such title. The property is limited to them and their heirs or to them and their heirs and assigns although the heirs of one of them will only succeed to the inheritance provided the joint tenancy be allowed to continue. A proper form of assurance between joint tenants is a release by deed and this release operates rather as an extinguishment of right than as a conveyance. The incidents of joint tenancy last only so long as the joint tenancy exists. Prior to the Law of Property Act, 1925, any one of them had power to sever the tenancy by disposing of his own share in the estate and destroy the joint tenancy (p). He may now sever the joint tenancy in an equitable but not in a legal estate so as to create a tenancy in common. A joint tenancy is severed upon bankruptcy (q) but not on marriage (r). If the effect is to vest the property in the husband then there will be a severance of the joint tenancy. From the moment of severance, unity of interest and title is destroyed, but unity of possession continues, and the share disposed of is discharged from the incidents of joint tenancy and becomes the subject of a tenancy in common. If there are three joint tenants and one of them severs his interest in favour of a stranger the latter holds an undivided third part of the lands as tenant in common with the remaining two. These two would remain joint tenants of their two-third share. Between a joint tenancy and tenancy in common the only similarity that exists is the unity of possession (s). The incidents of a joint tenancy in a Hindu coparcenery are peculiar to that law. I have not been able to find any text writer dealing with this subject whether a joint tenancy can by contract be created in unequal shares, for example, two joint tenants, one having a third and the other a two-third share in joint tenancy with the chance of survivorship. It is submitted that such an interest cannot be created as being repugnant to law. The point arose in the Bombay High Court in suit No. 663 of 1921, Gordhandas T. Mangaldas v. Kissondas T. Mangaldas, but the suit was compromised. It also arose in the Calcutta High Court. By a deed of Sharkatnama the members of a Hindu family, governed by the Mitakshara Law, declared that each of the members was entitled to a definite fractional part of the whole estate. It was held that this was not sufficient to constitute a valid partition according to Hindu Law. No doubt the expression of a joint tenant's interest in the joint estate as a half or a third or any other fraction, is not strictly consistent with the theory of the joint family property as set forth in the judgment of Appoovier v. Rama Subba (t), yet a mere definition of the whole without any indication of intention to divide interest and liabilities is not sufficient to constitute a legal dissolution of the joint family. It is impossible to overrule the expressed declaration of continuing joint ownership because the parties have by deed given definitions of their shares by describing

S. 7 them as what they would be if anyone claimed a partition. Even if for common conveniences they took the rents and profits of the estate in certain defined shares yet, in face of this distinct declaration that the community of interest remained unbroken, it would be no evidence of separation (u). A passage in Dart (v) shows that joint tenants are sometimes made to covenant both jointly and severally and it seems that where they contract without disclosing their separate interests the vendor will be entitled to such covenants: though it appears more reasonable to restrict their covenants to the extent of such shares as they would be entitled to on a severance, leading one to infer that a joint tenancy can be held in unequal shares. A joint tenant may alienate his interest in his lifetime but this, subject to that right, devolves on the survivor. Where one of two joint tenants agreed to sell his moiety and died, the purchaser could enforce specific performance of the contract against the survivor (w). If two persons being joint tenants perish by one blow, the estate will remain in joint tenancy in their respective heirs (x). When there are three joint tenants and one of them disposes of his interest to a stranger the latter is a tenant in common with the other two who continue as joint tenants of the two-thirds with the chance of survivorship (y). Effect of demise by joint tenants to one of them is a severance during the term (z). A corporation and a natural person may be tenants in common but not joint tenants for two reasons, -first, -a corporation has perpetual succession and, second, the legal ownership of a natural person which passes to his heirs and representatives is so essentially different from that of a corporation that the law regards them as incapable of coalescing in the manner necessary for the creation of a joint tenancy (a). An undivided share in immoveable property cannot by contract be held in joint tenancy nor is it possible for the owner of such share to create one by way of trust. In Mahomedan Law an undivided interest in property is known as Mushaa. As to making a wakf of a Mushaa, the Courts in India are divided in opinion. According to the follower of Imam Abu Yusuf (b), such a wakf may be created by mere declaration whilst according to the follower of Imam Muhammad it cannot unless the wakif should actually divest himself of possession (c). Hence where parties are subject to the latter school of thought no joint tenancy by the creation of trust or contract is possible.

Tenants in common.—Tenants in common are such as have a unity of possession but distinct and several titles to their shares which are by no means necessarily equal so that one tenant in common may have but a life or other limited interest in his share, another may be seized in fee of his. A tenant in common is as to his own undivided share, precisely in the position of the owner of an entire and separate estate (d). On the death of a Mahomedan his heirs take their share in severalty (e). Tenants in common, when severing, must take mutual conveyances. It cannot be transferred by mere agreement. With regard to covenants by tenants in common, each one of them enters into usual covenants for title as to his own share or interest in the property (f). Acts, circumstances and dealings may rebut the presumption of joint tenancy. The Court is at liberty to receive evidence of the acts of joint tenants shewing that they considered themselves entitled as tenants in common.

1. A joint letter written to trustees of a will signifies acceptance of privilege given by a testator to purchase a warehouse (g).

2. When a purchase is made out of moneys standing in joint account in a bank it is not necessarily joint tenancy. The origin of the money and the acts and intention of the parties must be looked to and a conclusion in favour of the tenancy in common drawn from the circumstances (h).

3. Notwithstanding insertion of the joint account clause the mortgagees were entitled to the mortgage-moneys as tenants in common (i).

An estate conveyed to persons in form as joint tenants has been adjudged to have been held by them as tenants in common when the purchase was for a joint speculation (j). There is no fiduciary relationship between tenants in common nor can one co-tenant impose upon another an obligation of a fiduciary character by leaving the management of the property in his hands (k). A purchaser from a coparcener is not a tenant in common with the other members (l). The subject is dealt with in sections 44 to 47 of the Act.

Coparcener.—As to alienation of undivided interest in coparcenary property, in Bombay, according to the Mitakshara Law, it is now well established that a coparcener can alienate his own interest in joint family property provided there is valuable consideration for it (m). The same rule applies in Madras (n) which has gone so far as to recognize an alienation by way of gift. The view adopted under the same text in Calcutta and Allahabad is to the contrary. The Privy Council in a case from Bengal held that as to ancestral estate under the Mitakshara Law so long as the estate is undivided and the share of a member of the family is indefinite it is not competent to a coparcener to alienate his share without the consent of the other coparceners (o). The same tribunal, in a case from Allahabad where father and son constituted a joint family holding ancestral estate, held that under the Mitakshara Law as administered by the High Courts of the United Provinces and Bengal, an undivided share in ancestral estate held by a son as a member of the joint family in coparcenary cannot be alienated by him without the consent of

- S. 7 those who share the joint estate (p). The same rule was extended to father's alienation which was neither for legal necessity nor for an antecedent debt (q). As to Berar, the Judicial Committee accepted the view that Mitakshara is to be interpreted there in the same manner as in Bombay (r). A similar view is prevalent in the Central Provinces (s). The above rules do not extend to a surviving coparcener whether the alienation be for or without consideration (t). Again, no coparcener can make a gift of his undivided interest (u) except with the consent of the others (v).

Severance of joint family.—Marriage under the Special Marriage Act (III of 1872) of any member of an undivided family affects a severance from such family (w).

Hindu widow.—The power of disposition which the law denies to a Hindu widow who has inherited property of her husband may be exercised when supported on the ground either of legal necessity or the performance of religious acts. The Hindu system recognizes two sets of religious acts. One in connection with actual obsequies of the deceased and the periodical performance of the obsequial rites described in the Hindu religious law, which are considered as essential for the salvation of the soul of the deceased. The other relates to acts which although not essential or obligatory, are still pious observances which conduce to the bliss of the deceased's soul. With regard to the first set her powers are wider than in respect of the acts which are simply pious, and if performed are meritorious so far as they conduce to the spiritual benefit of the deceased. In the first case, if the income of the property or the property itself be not sufficient to cover the expenses, she would be entitled to sell the whole of it. In the other case she can alienate only a small portion for pious or charitable purposes as she may have in view (x). In the first set would be included payment of husband's debts though barred (y) unless her deceased husband had repudiated the debts before his death (z), or she had discharged the debt in his lifetime (a). Pilgrimage for the benefit of the husband's soul (b) or to Pandarpur (c) or Gaya (d) but not to Benares (e), the digging of tanks (f), building of temples (g), performance of father's shraddha ceremony (h).

Gifts for the observance of bhog (food offerings) to a deity and for the maintenance of priests for the salvation of her deceased husband, his family and widow (i), or by way of suphal sankalp to a priest of Gaya (j), or in favour of a family deity when also the test is the proportion of the property and not the necessity of the deity (k), fall in the second set of religious acts. In Lachmi Kunwar v. Durga Kunwar (l), a gift made by a Hindu widow for the spiritual benefit of her husband, after she had returned from a pilgrimage, was upheld, and in Gobind Upadhyaya v. Lakhrani (m), a similar gift made by a widow on her return from a pilgrimage to Gaya was treated as valid and binding on the reversionary heirs of her husband. In drawing the above distinction their Lordships sounded a note of warning that the distinction was in no small degree embarrassing and care should be taken to avoid the confusion which arose by mixing up an indispensable or obligatory duty with a pious purpose which, although optional, was spiritually beneficial to the deceased (n). The texts of almost all Rishis were quoted in Ram Sumaran Prasad v. Gobind Das (o), and received the interpretation of Turner, L. J., who stated thus:—"For religious or charitable purposes, or those which are supposed to conduce to the spiritual welfare of her husband, she has a larger power of disposition than that which she possesses for purely worldly purposes. To support an alienation for the last she must shew necessity" (p). But a widow whose right is only confined to maintenance and is not in possession of the property has no such power as aforesaid (q). This was the case of a mother who had not inherited the property and whose authority to act for the spiritual benefit of her deceased son was not on the same footing as a similar act would have been by the widow or by the minor sons as in Bai Chanchal v. Chimanlal (r) where also the widow was not in possession. As to moveables inherited by a widow, her power of disposal depends upon the law by which she is governed. In that part of the Presidency of Bombay where Mayukha prevails she has an absolute power of disposal (s). In the other provinces, including that part of the Presidency of Bombay where the Mitakshara prevails, her power over moveables inherited by her is analogous to that over immoveable property (t). This does not include testamentary power over inherited property (u). Again, a widow's power according to Mayukha over moveables acquired on partition with her sons is absolute (v).

With consent of reversioner.—Alienation by a Hindu widow with consent of the reversioners may be :—

- (a) for legal necessity, actual or presumed ;
- (b) without legal necessity.

S. 7 if such necessity is not proved aliunde, and the alienee does not prove inquiry on his part, and honest belief in the necessity) the consent of such reversioners as might fairly be expected to be interested to quarrel with the transaction will be held to afford a presumptive proof which, if not rebutted by contrary proof, will validate the transaction as a right and proper one (w). That is to say, the consent is not conclusive proof of the existence of legal necessity but raises a presumption of the existence of such necessity (x). The operation of the above rule must ordinarily be limited to transfers for consideration and cannot appropriately be extended to voluntary transfers by way of gift where there is no question of legal necessity (y). Further, the alienation must be to a stranger and not to a sole reversioner or to one of the reversioners with the consent of the others (z). Where part of the consideration for a transfer by a widow is found to have been applied to the payment of the husband's debts, the transaction should be set aside on terms that the reversioners pay to the transferee the sum so applied (a). As to (b), when she alienates without legal necessity with the consent of the reversioner, the latter cannot dispute its validity (b), and herein the existence or otherwise of consideration is immaterial (c).

Without the consent of the reversioner.—An alienation by a Hindu widow without the consent of the reversioner may be :—

- (a) for legal necessity,
- (b) without a legal necessity.

As to (a) her powers are no less than those of a manager of an infant's estate (d). She may not alienate in order to improve the husband's estate but she can make a permanent alienation if justified on the ground of necessity. The "necessity" involves some notion of pressure from outside and not merely a desire to better or develop the estate (e). Section 38 of the present Act permits an alienation by a Hindu widow where the property is insufficient for her maintenance if the transferee after using reasonable care to ascertain the existence of such circumstances has acted in good faith. In case (b) the transfer is not valid beyond her lifetime (f).

and the reversioners are not bound (g). It is settled law that an alienation by a widow in excess of her power is not altogether void but only voidable by the reversioners who may either singly or as a body be precluded from exercising their right to avoid it either by express ratification or by acts which treat it as valid or binding (h).

Necessity.—Necessity to justify alienation by a Hindu widow includes the right to mortgage for her own maintenance and support of dependent relatives of her husband and those of persons for the maintenance of whom the deceased would have been liable if alive (i), and a sale of the estate for debts contracted for the thread and marriage ceremonies of one of her daughter's sons (j). So also an alienation for expenses of marriage of the deceased owner's uncle's son's daughter (k) and those of daughters (l) and son's daughter (m) or the betrothal of her daughter (n). An alienation to provide for dowry for the widow's daughter provided it is reasonable cannot be questioned, it being immaterial whether the deed was executed before or after the marriage ceremony (o), and so also a gift upon the occasion of her daughter's gowna ceremony (p). And a mother who has acquired the estate of her deceased son could make a valid gift to her son-in-law on the occasion of his marriage with her daughter provided it was found to be otherwise reasonable in extent (q). The execution of a mortgage to pay for shraddha ceremony of her mother, Government revenue, costs of succession certificate and a rent decree was held to have been made for legal necessity (r).

But payment of money to recover property sold for arrears of road-cess is not a legal necessity but a personal debt (s). Family debts not incurred by the widow and costs of defending law suits are also cases of legal necessity (t). Where there was an actual existing necessity the circumstances that the widow's mismanagement contributed towards it will not affect the alienation unless it be shown that the lender acted mala fide (u).

Benefit of the estate.—Yet a third ground on which her power of alienation has been upheld is where it is for "the benefit of the estate," a phrase as to the interpretation of which the Courts in India are not unanimous, as will appear from the undermentioned cases (v).

Reversioner how far bound.—Attestation is not evidence of consent (w). A reversioner who is a party to an instrument and takes benefit under the transaction evidenced thereby is precluded from questioning any part of it (x). But a reversioner who has not by any act or omission debarred himself from insisting on this contention may, notwithstanding the reversion is an expectancy, sue for a declaration, for an expectant reversioner's right to sue for a declaration has statutory recognition (y). Lapse of time raises a presumption that the parties to the document included all persons who had an actual or possible interest in the properties (z), but not that it was justified by legal necessity (a). A reversioner who has not consented may ratify the transaction or impeach it by treating it as a nullity without the intervention of the Court after the death of the alienating widow (b). This right in a Bombay case has been described as "election" (c). Where the reversioner is a female the consent must be of the male reversioner, for if the next reversioner be a female her concurrence would be of no avail. In order to render alienation indefeasible the consent of the reversioner immediately next to such female reversioner must also be obtained, and this is the law even where a female, as in Bombay, takes an absolute estate (d). A reversioner who joins in a widow's mortgage of her husband's estate is not liable to satisfy the debt (e).

Indian Succession Act.—A fourth mode of alienation open to a widow on the ground of legal necessity is with leave of the Court first had and obtained under section 307 of the Indian Succession Act. Where a Hindu widow has obtained a grant of Letters of Administration and subsequently adopted a son, her estate is divested and she cannot obtain an order under this section. Her proper course is to have the grant revoked under section 262 of the Indian Succession Act and apply for the appointment of a guardian for the adopted son and obtain an order to alienate under the Guardian and Wards Act.

Borrowing on personal credit.—Ordinarily, a Hindu widow raises money for necessity either by sale or mortgage. The Courts in India differ on the question whether property in the hands of a reversioner is liable to satisfy a personal debt not secured, or such debt which a widow, while enjoying a widow's estate, has properly incurred in the course of management of the property. The Calcutta High Court (f) admitted her right to borrow moneys on her personal credit rendering the estate liable. This view was recently adopted by a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court (g), overruling its previous decisions (h) and dissenting from the Allahabad (i) and Madras (j) High Courts.

Joint widows.—The settled law is that if a Hindu dies leaving two widows they succeed as joint tenants with a right of survivorship. They may partition the estate between themselves and each may enjoy the income of her share. Each can deal with her life-interest but she cannot alienate the corpus as to prejudice the survivor or future reversioner. Together they can burden the reversion for a legal necessity but one of them acting without authority of the other cannot prejudice the right of survivorship by burdening or alienating any part of, the estate. It has, however, been observed, although the case has not arisen, that if the concurrence of the co-widow was asked for borrowing, and unreasonably refused, a mortgage under those circumstances would bind the estate (k). Further, each of them may also relinquish her right of survivorship in that portion of the estate which is held by the other. The effect of such an arrangement would be that on the death of one the estate in her possession will not revert to the other who has relinquished her right but will go to her heirs as if it was her stridhan and the heirs, or, if she makes an alienation of any portion of the estate, the alienee will continue in possession of the estate till the death of the last survivor (l). The two cases (m) mentioned below form an exception to the general current of authority on the ground that the senior widow has power to alienate without concurrence of the junior for necessary purpose—a proposition not supported by the actual decision. It is explained in a recent case that the Judges there were of opinion that the senior widow was recognized as manager or agent of the other, an inference which could be made only in a case where there was no known hostility between the widows (n). It has been observed that a mortgage by one for legal necessity where concurrence of the other has been withheld unreasonably would bind the estate (o).

Duty of purchaser or mortgagee.—It is the duty of the purchaser or mortgagee from the manager of a joint Hindu family to satisfy himself of the existence of necessity as would entitle him to enter into the transaction binding the minor members. This obligation cannot be cast on the Court and he cannot insist that unless the Court sanctions the transaction he will not enter into it. If, however, on proper and reasonable inquiries he is satisfied as to necessity, he is justified in entering into the transaction (p). This was commented on by a Division Bench of the same Court (q).

Surrender by a Hindu widow.—This doctrine of surrender and consequent acceleration of the reversionary estate has not been incorporated by judicial decisions but is to be found in original texts of Hindu Law (r). Surrender is the effacement of the widow by renunciation of her interest to the nearest reversioner if one or to all reversioners nearest in degree, if more than one at the moment of alienation, thereby accelerating their interest. If there be more than one widow all of them must efface themselves (s). It may be accomplished by a single act or by a series of alienations the cumulative effect of which is the total effacement of the widow (t). In such circumstances the question of necessity (u) does not arise. But it must be bona fide and not a device to enlarge her own estate with the rever-

S. 7 sioner (v). The validity of the surrender does not depend upon the widow's motive (w). It must be of the entire estate so that the widow's estate is completely destroyed and extinguished (x). Being an effacement of the widow there cannot be a widow partly effaced and partly not so. Next reversioners cannot confer an unrestricted prospective power of alienation on the widow. The power of accelerating the reversioner's estate cannot be used by the widow as a means of enlarging her own estate or effecting alienations to strangers as it will be an abuse on the limited power vested in her. The reversioner's right to validate alienations is not derived from the power to surrender. The former is analogous to the power of sapindas to consent to an adoption: the latter is based upon the application of the English doctrine of merger (y). There is a distinction when a surrender is made to a female reversioner who takes, as in Bombay, an absolute estate and who, as in Benares and other provinces, takes a limited estate. In the former case the surrender is indefeasible (z) whilst in the latter case the effect is merely to accelerate her succession and put her by anticipation in possession of her life estate so that on the death of the widow it reverts to the nearest male reversioner (a). The validity of the renunciation is independent of the validity of the agreement as to the subsequent disposal of the property by the alienee (b). A widow cannot by the device of surrender enlarge her estate and therefore with the consent of the presumptive reversioner she cannot convert her life estate in any portion of her husband's estate which she retains for herself into an absolute estate freed from the shackles on alienation (c).

To the general principle established in Goundan's case (d), that the surrender must be total, a somewhat anomalous sanction was accorded by Bhagwat Koer's case (e) and Misser's case (f). Both these cases imposed on the general principle a qualification that on a surrender the widow may retain a small part of the estate for her maintenance. These cases were results of compromise. The Bombay High Court, not being able to reconcile the qualification with the principle held, in a case where the widow reserved 42 acres and 31 gunthas inherited from her husband for her maintenance, that it was a device on her part to divide the estate with the reversioner (g). The same Court has, however, held valid a surrender of a life estate by a widow to the next reversioner who agreed to maintain the widow for her life (h). Misser's case was explained and distinguished in Mansingh's case (i) where their Lordships declared the surrender which reserved maintenance allowance to the widow as invalid being not only in contravention of section 60 of the Court of Wards Act, the widows being wards of the Court, but also void under Hindu Law. Where a Hindu widow gave up all her rights in her husband's estate in favour of her co-widow and the latter predeceased the former, the reversioner's estate is not accelerated (j). On a surrender by a Hindu widow all prior alienations in excess of her powers are liable to be challenged by the reversioner immediately just as they could be impeached on her death. He has not to wait till the widow's death (k).

Manager of a Hindu family.—The principle laid down by the Privy Council in Hanuman Prasad v. Musammatt Babooee (l) as to the power of a manager for an infant heir to charge an estate not his own, was adopted by that tribunal in case of a sale (m) by a manager of a joint family consisting of a father and sons who constituted the coparcenery. In a coparcenery the manager, known as karta, is naturally the father (n), and in his absence the senior members of the family. A younger member when put forward to the outside world by the elder members as a manager may also alienate (o). The power is a limited and qualified one which can only be exercised rightly by the manager in case of need (p) or for the benefit of the estate (q). The actual pressure on the estate, the danger to be averted or the benefit to be conferred in the particular instance are the criteria to be regarded (r). In the case above referred to, their Lordships held that a sale of joint property should not be set aside merely because part of the proceeds, which is not a small part, is not proved to have been applied for purposes of necessity. The real question to be considered is whether the sale itself was justified by necessity; if the purchaser has acted honestly and made due inquiry as to existence of necessity he is not bound to account for the application of the price (s). The rights of the coparceners in a joint Hindu family consisting of a father and his sons, grandsons and great grandsons, do not differ from those of the coparceners in a like family consisting of undivided brethren, except in so far as the sons are affected by the obligation of the Hindu Law to pay their father's debts, and by the fact that he is naturally the manager of the joint family estate (t). All schools are agreed that a father can alienate coparcenery property in case of legal necessity or for the benefit of the estate or to discharge an antecedent debt of his own provided the debt was not contracted by the father for an illegal or an immoral purpose. Equally agreed are they that where the share of a coparcener has passed out of the joint family by sale in execution of a decree such sale cannot be impeached (u), but if the coparcener dies before attachment in his lifetime, then the right by survivorship is in conflict with the right in execution and being prior in point of time, defeats the rights of the execution creditor (v). It has been

S. 7 observed that the term "necessity" must not be strictly construed. The benefit to the family may under certain circumstances mean a necessity for the transaction (w), nor is a sale to be set aside because a portion of the consideration unsupported by legal necessity is only an insignificant proportion of the whole. The father of a joint Hindu family governed by the Mitakshara can only sell or mortgage the joint family property so as to bind his sons in two cases—namely, (1) where the alienation is for family necessity; (2) where the alienation is made to discharge a debt which was antecedent to the alienation (x).

Further, during the father's lifetime an alienation by him is effective only in the first case, since its validity in the second case rests upon the pious duty of the sons to discharge their father's debt and that duty arises only upon his death (y). Dealing with an alienation by a father as manager of a joint family consisting of himself and his two minor sons, the Judicial Committee exhaustively reviewed the authorities and as a result of which summed up the following propositions (z):—

- (1) The managing coparcener (which expression includes the father of a joint undivided estate) cannot alienate or burden the estate qua manager except for purpose of necessity (a).
- (2) If he is the father, which expression includes the grandfather and great-grandfather, and the reversioners are the sons (which expression includes the grandsons and great grandsons) he may, by incurring debt, so long as it is not for an immoral purpose, lay the estate open to be taken in execution proceedings upon a decree for payment of that debt (b). The burden of proving the nature of the debt is on the sons, proof of general extravagance or profligacy on the part of the father is sufficient (c).
- (3) If he purports to burden the estate by mortgage, then unless that mortgage is to discharge an antecedent debt, it would not bind the estate (d).

- (4) An antecedent debt means antecedent in fact as well as in time, that is to say, that the debt must be truly independent and not part of the transaction impeached (e).
- (5) There is no rule that this result is affected by the question whether the father who contracted the debt or burdened the estate, is alive or dead (f). Instances of sale being permitted when the father for whose debt the sale was made was still alive may be found in the below mentioned cases (g).

The touchstone of a manager's alienation is the existence of a legal necessity (h). If this be established the alienation is valid in spite of absence of consent among the members of the family (i). He cannot bind the estate at his own free will and without any compelling cause so as to bind the repudiating reversioners. He may, however, alienate with the consent of some or all the coparceners. In the latter case the alienation cannot be questioned though there be no legal or justifying necessity. In the former case, in Bombay and Madras and Berars, it would bind such as have consented (j), but in the other provinces it would not bind the share of any member of the family, not even the manager (k). An alienation of family property made by the manager of a joint Hindu family without legal necessity is not absolutely void. It is voidable at the instance of persons whose interests are affected by it, viz., the coparceners in the property. The repudiating coparceners may uphold the sale or seek to repudiate it (l). A sale was effected by a grandfather as manager of a joint family to discharge encumbrances upon the interest which the plaintiffs acquired upon their birth. They not being for an immoral consideration were held as antecedent debts incurred before birth of the plaintiffs to discharge which the joint family property could validly be sold (m). Again, a manager of a joint Hindu family of traders has power to sell for the benefit of the family. In a case where in return for balance due from a customer the joint Hindu family of traders consisting of two brothers, of whom one had a major and two minor sons, had to purchase the land from the said customer at some loss, and in order to reduce the loss the father and manager of the family agreed to sell the land to the plaintiff at a certain price, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to enforce specific performance of the contract to sell against the minor members also (n). It has been held also that such a contract on the death of the manager can be enforced against the survivors when they are majors (o).

But in the absence of proof of an antecedent debt or of necessity an alienation of the joint family property of a Mitakshara family by its karta is void ; the transaction itself gives to the alienee no rights against the karta's interest in the joint family property (p). It must be observed that a purchaser cannot sue for partition and obtain an allotment by metes and bounds of his vendor's share but he must file a suit for general partition (q) though it has now been settled by decision of a Full Bench that there is no fluctuation in the share to which an alienee is entitled, his share being the share of the vendor at the date of the alienation (r).

Enforceability of contract of sale against minors.—A contract for the sale of joint ancestral property for legal necessity or benefit of the family entered into by the manager of a joint Hindu family where some coparceners are minors can be specifically enforced against the joint family including the minor coparceners. To such a case the rule in Mir Sarwarjan v. Fakhruddin (s) does not apply. Such a contract stands on a different footing from contracts made by the guardian of a minor or manager of a minor's estate. In the former case the manager represents the whole family as one unit, in the latter case the contracting party is the minor alone who acts through his guardian. In the former case no question of want of mutuality on the ground of minority can arise (t).

Property passing out of the joint family.—A distinction subsists between a private alienation and an auction sale. As soon as the joint family property has passed to the auction purchaser by virtue of the sale and its confirmation and whether delivery has taken place or not, the property has "passed out of the joint family under a sale in execution of a decree" within the scope of the rule in Suraj Bansi's case (u) and the auction purchaser is entitled to protect himself against a suit by the son unless the latter establishes that the debt was contracted for an illegal or immoral purpose and when the auction purchaser is a stranger it must further be established that he had notice of the nature of the debt (v).

Purdanashin lady.—It is not necessary nor desirable in such a case to insist upon a clear understanding of each detail of a matter which may be much involved in legal technicalities. It is sufficient that the general result is understood by the lady and that she had people disinterested and competent to give advice with a fair understanding of the whole matter who advised her that she should execute the deed (w). Where both a purdanashin and illiterate lady put her thumb impression by remaining behind the purdah not having seen the attesting witness and where the deed was designed for payment of debts of her husband, a man of violent temper and addicted to drinks and prostitutes, it was held that there was no intelligent execution of the deed by her (x). Although the extent and character of the explanation required must depend upon circumstances, the disposition made must be substantially understood by her. It must really be her mental act as the execution is her physical act (y). To entitle her to protection it is not enough to prove that she lives in some degree of seclusion. So where a lady who had stood in the witness-box, put in tenants, fixed and recovered rent from them, paid municipal rates and taxes, was not regarded as purdanashin lady (z). In Farid-un-nissa v. Mukhtar Ahmad (a), the Privy Council considered the nature and extent of the onus of proof in such cases as appearing from the decisions of the Judicial Committee. In the case of a document executed by a purdanashin woman it is not sufficient to shew that the document was read out to her; it must further be proved that it was explained to her, and that she really understood its nature and effect. The onus of proof in such a case is on the party seeking to uphold the transaction effected by the document and the quantum of evidence required depends upon the circumstances of each case. The mere fact that the woman lives in seclusion or sits behind a pardah does not necessarily show that she is weak-minded, ignorant or incapable of understanding her affairs (b). An admission will not be binding and conclusive in the case of a purdanashin lady (c).

Mahant.—A math is a distinct entity endowed with juristic personality and as such competent to acquire and become possessed of property by gifts or by endowments (d). An asthal, commonly known in Northern India as a math, is an institution of a monastic nature established for the service of a particular cult. The mahant is the head, he manages the property, administers its affairs, and the whole assets are vested in him as the owner thereof in trust for the institution itself. The nature of the ownership is an ownership in trust and although large administrative powers are vested in him this trust does exist and must be respected (e). Any property that stands in the name of an idol or an institution represents a dedication to the Almighty and is debuttar property. The shebait or mahant is only a custodian of the property. To exempt such property from attachment and sale in execution, the onus is on the mahant to prove that the ownership rests with the idol. A mahant, even though an ascetic, is capable of holding personal property. The test to determine whether the property is dedicated to a math or is the absolute property of the mahant is whether the math is subservient to the mahant or vice versa, and whether the mahant is under a legal obligation to apply the income of the property in his possession solely to the purpose of the institution, or whether, in order to justify his profession as an ascetic, he devotes at his discretion a fraction of the income to the purposes of the math (f). The power of a mahant to alienate debuttar property being, like the power of a manager for an infant heir, limited to cases of unavoidable necessity, a permanent lease at a fixed rent, though adequate at the time, is a breach of duty in the mahant, and on the most favourable construction could only enure for the life of the grantor and was not binding on his successor (g). If the lender acts honestly and makes proper inquiries he is protected though there be no real

S. 7 necessity (h). Loan for daily worship is a necessity (i). An idol cannot be regarded perpetually as a minor (j). The head of a math is not a trustee in the sense in which that term is understood in English Law. The conception of a trust in the English legal sense is unknown in the Hindu system pure and simple. He is nevertheless, in view of the obligations and duties resting on him, answerable as a trustee in the general sense for proper administration (k). Alienation not justified by legal necessity, is void (l). In case of a mortgage, the immediate cause of borrowing should be considered (m). He may mortgage or sell for sradh of a deceased mahant (n). When a loan is applied for discharging duties for which he is responsible as head it can be recovered from the succeeding head of the math and in the event of his default by the appointment of a receiver of the income of the math so that his beneficial interest may be applied to discharge the decree (o).

A decree may be made charging temple funds where moneys are borrowed for temple purposes under a promise to pay out of temple funds but not creating a charge thereon (p). To recover moneys due on a mortgage of debuttar property the decree may be passed against the property (q). Although an assignment or disposition of a math and its properties by the mahant is void, either a sale or permanent lease by him of an item of property appertaining to the math, even if not for necessity, is valid during the tenure of office of the mahant (r). A consent decree in a suit, in which the debuttar estate is not properly impleaded, cannot terminate the debuttar character of the endowed property (s). And where the ultimate benefit is for persons other than the family deity, it is not an absolute debuttar.

Where it appeared that the existing property was the property of the idol and the idol was duly worshipped, a proper dedication could be presumed. A debuttar property can be transferred under certain circumstances, viz., (i) where such transfer was allowed by custom, (ii) where such transfer was made by one of the *shebait*s to a co-shebait, and (iii) where all the *shebait*s combined to make the transfer to a stranger (t). The duties of a hereditary office and the emoluments appertaining thereto remain within the family of the original grantee. A member of the family could alienate his share in favour of the remaining members of the family but he could not endeavour to alienate either to a person outside the family or to the original grantor or a descendant from him (u). A pujari has no right of beneficial enjoyment (v). In the Madras Presidency, where private temples are practically unknown, the presumption is that temples are public, but in case of Malabar temples there is no presumption one way or the other (w).

The manager of a temple is known as the shebait who is by virtue of his office the administrator of the property. As regards the service of the temple and the duties appertaining to it, he is in the position of the holder of an office or dignity (x). The word uralan means the guardian or manager of a temple and uraima the office of uralan (y). Both idols and maths are juristic persons whilst a temple is not (z).

Judgment debtor.—So long as the Collector has been authorized to exercise the powers or duties conferred or imposed on him by paragraphs 1 to 10 of Schedule 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, the judgment debtor or his representative in interest shall be incompetent to mortgage, charge, lease, or alienate such property except with the written permission of the Collector and this restriction is absolute and no implied limitation can be read into it: hence a mortgage of such property is void (a) so also a gift (b). With this may be compared the bar of section 64 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, and section 52 of the Transfer of Property Act.

Crown.—The Crown has power to buy and sell property. On the sale of property by the Crown no covenants for title can be demanded.

8. Unless a different intention is expressed or necessarily implied, a transfer of property passes forthwith to the transferee all the interest which the transferor is then capable of passing in the property, and in the legal incidents thereof.

Such incidents include, where the property is land, the easements annexed thereto, the rents and profits thereof accruing after the transfer, and all things attached to the earth ; and, where the property is machinery attached to the earth, the moveable parts thereof ; and, where the property is a house, the easements annexed thereto, the rent thereof accruing after the transfer, and the locks, keys, bars, doors, windows, and all other things provided for permanent use therewith ; and, where the property is a debt or other actionable claim, the securities therefor (except where they are also for other debts or claims not transferred to the transferee), but not arrears of interest accrued before the transfer ;

S. 8 and, where property is money or other property yielding income, the interest or income thereof accruing after the transfer takes effect.

Feeders to a transfer.—According to this section, when a transfer of property flows from the transferor to the transferee it carries along with it two feeders, viz., the entire estate of the transferee in the property and what is legally appurtenant to such property.

Law of Property Act, 1925, section 63.—This section re-enacts section 63 of the Act of 1881 (c).

(1) Every conveyance is effectual to pass all the estate, right, title, interest, claim and demand which the conveying parties respectively have in, to, or on the property conveyed, or expressed or intended so to be, or which they respectively have power to convey in, to, or on the same.

(2) This section applies only if and as far as a contrary intention is not expressed in the conveyance, and has effect subject to the terms of the conveyance and to the provisions therein contained.

(3) This section applies to conveyances made after the thirty-first day of December, eighteen hundred and eighty-one.

Operation of transfer.—This enactment, like section 63 of the Act of 1881, was intended to curtail general words used in a conveyance. Neither, however, in England nor in this country were these enactments heeded. The practical use of the doctrine enunciated in the section is to be found in that part of the deed of alienation which follows the statement of the consideration and the receipt. In instruments of alienation in the case of freeholds the general words used are "grant, convey and assure" followed by the description of the property technically known as "the parcels." To the description are added "general words," descriptive not only of every kind of easements, privileges and appurtenances belonging to the property but also fixtures, trees and timber. These general words are followed by what is commonly known as "all the estate clause" which conveys or purports to convey all the estate, right, title, interest, claim and demand whatsoever of the executing party. The all-estate clause transfers, under section 8, all the interest which the transferor is then capable of passing in the property while the general words which precede this clause transfers the legal incidents in the property. Exceptions and reservations, if any, intended by the parties, expressly follow the estate clause unless the law presumes a reservation of such rights and easements as are specified in sections 13, 14, and 15 of the Easements Act. The legal expression "all other estate, right, title, interest, claim and demand" is understood to mean the quality of interest which the transferor has in a particular given property. Where in a deed of composition the words "and all the other estate, if any," of the debtor following the estate clause came up for construction, it was contended that these words included an estate not specified in the Schedule to the deed of composition. The Court of Appeal held that the general words of the assignment were controlled by the recital that the deed included property in the Schedule and that the life-interest of the settlor in the settlement not referred to in the Schedule did not pass to the trustee of the deed of composition (d) the words "and all other estate, if any," being treated as surplusage. Now there are three rules applicable to the construction of such an instrument. If the recitals are clear and the operative part is ambiguous, the recitals govern the construction. If the recitals are ambiguous, and the operative part is clear, the operative part must prevail. If both the recitals and the operative part are clear, but they are inconsistent with each other, the operative part is to be preferred. Where plaintiff purported to convey the fee to the defendant, an equitable estate to the extent of a leasehold interest, was held to have passed to the defendant (e).

Unless a different intention.—These words indicate that unless there is an exception or reservation in a transfer everything passes by a transfer where the transferor conveys as owner. To that extent the rule is a rule of construction. On a construction of a mortgage, a sale and certificate of sale of shares in a zamindari where the documents contained no words of exception or reservation that they conveyed all interest of the mortgagor, vendor and judgment-debtor respectively in the zemindari, their interests in the houses on the land and in the profits and rents derived from them passed in the absence of any words showing an intention to retain or exclude them (f). A gift which enjoined the performance of religious ceremonies and celebration of festivals, including a provision for the support of the donee, was held to confer on the latter a life-interest only (g). A maintenance grant by a Raja to a member of the family was held not to carry with it the right to open mines and raise minerals (h). It has been held that an estate for the life of A. and afterwards to the heirs of his body was recognized by the Act as creating an absolute estate (*h*¹).

All the interest which the transferor is then capable of passing.—As a general principle, where a person has two estates, one larger and the other smaller, and purports to convey the entire property without any words of limitation, he must be taken to be conveying the highest estate he has, that is to say, if an executor having a one-third personal beneficial interest in the estate purports to convey the whole of it, without qualification or limitation, he must be taken to be conveying in his character as executor and not in that of one having a beneficial interest only in a fraction of the whole estate purported to be conveyed (i). The same construction was adopted where a Hindu widow who obtained probate of the will of her husband executed a conveyance which did not expressly mention in what particular capacity she sold but who purported to convey "all the estate, right, title, interest, etc." she had in the property (j). A somewhat curious case arose before the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court. There one M. executed a sale deed of a certain property to his mother, one of his heirs, who was authorized to spend the purchase-moneys on certain charities to be determined by her. He died three days after. The mother instead of expending the moneys in charities, dedicated the property by way of wakf, constituting herself, and after her, one of the four heirs of the deceased, mutawali. Later the heirs of M. other than the mother and the mutawali successfully asserted their right of inheritance and repudiated the

S. 8 deed of sale as being a gift in disguise to an heir not sanctioned by Mahomedan Law. The sale deed was set aside but a majority of the Full Bench held that the wakf was valid to the extent of the share of the mother, if not being expressly or impliedly excluded. The dissenting judgment, which their Lordships of the Judicial Committee held to be correct, was that the sale deed being void, the wakf was inoperative and fell with it (k).

Legal incidents thereof.—On a transfer not only does the whole interest of the transferor pass in the property but also whatever is appurtenant to the estate or the property passes forthwith to the transferee. These incidents are enumerated in the section. This list is by no means exhaustive and must be considered only as illustrative.

Easements annexed thereto.—There is no definition of the word “annexed” either in this Act or in the Easements Act, V of 1882. The latter Act defines what an easement is and their sub-divisions. Section 7 of the said Act enacts what easements are. Section 13 deals with easements of necessity and quasi-easements. Two properties which had remained united in one owner became ultimately vested, one in the plaintiff and the other in the defendant. The former was entitled to use a particular right of way but refused to put in evidence the deed under which he became the owner, and a presumption was raised against him from refusal to produce the title-deeds. The Court decided that no easement passed by section 8 to the plaintiff as a legal incident of the property, as plaintiff by refusing to produce the title-deeds prevented the Court from ascertaining whether a different intention was expressed or necessarily implied in the conveyance to him, and it is only when a different intention is not expressed or necessarily implied in the transfer of property that “easements annexed thereto” pass by virtue of this section (l). These are included in the legal incidents on a transfer of property, whether it be “land” or “house.” They must be existing at or before the transfer (*l*¹).

Rents.—Both on a transfer of “land” as well as “house” rents accruing after the transfer pass to the transferee but not rents accrued due before the transfer (m) unless there is a different intention expressed or necessarily implied. A purchaser could, however, recover arrears of rent by contract. Such a contract must fulfil the requirements of section 130 of this Act (n). How rents should be apportioned is enacted in section 36 while section 55 in sub-clause (a) of clauses (4) and (6) states when the relative right of the vendor determines and that of the purchaser commences to the rents and profits.

Profits.—These are legal incidents on a transfer of land and not of a house.

House.—On a transfer of a house the easements annexed thereto and rents accruing after the transfer are legal incidents in common with a transfer of land. It also passes with it the locks, doors, bars, windows and other things provided for permanent use with the house. The doors and window shutters have no separate existence (o). They cannot be removed in execution on a warrant of distress (p), nor attached as moveable property (q). On a sale of distillery buildings the vats and pipes do not go with them (r). The English Law of fixtures does not apply to India. When a house or immoveable property is sold all rights and privileges concomitant to it and previously enjoyed by the owner go with it, specially when there is no provision to the contrary in the deed of sale, and it is of no use to the seller to reserve them (s). When a share in a village is transferred the house and kotha are incidental to it (t) so also a house or grove situate in a village (u). A lease for cultivation carries with it trees and shrubs standing on it (v). An auction purchaser at a Court sale acquires bamboo clumps standing on the land (w). The word "tenement" is obviously used synonymously with "dwelling house" (x). Although being part of the house it means a house (y). The word "hereditament" in its settled sense is used to denote such things as may be the subject-matter of inheritance but not the inheritance itself (z). The word is applied to things which are the subject of occupation (a).

Machinery.—On a transfer of machinery attached to the earth the moveable parts are the legal incidents. It does not pass with a transfer of the land unless attached to it for the permanent beneficial enjoyment thereof (b).

Other property yielding income.—These would include such properties as Government securities, shares and stocks. On transfer of such property income accruing after the transfer would pass to the transferee while that which had accrued up to the date of the transfer would belong to the transferor. This too is subject to a different intention being expressed by the parties, for it often happens that shares are sold with the dividends annexed, in which case the dividends belong to the transferee, they being included in the price paid by the transferee to the transferor.

Title-deeds.—Title-deeds are not mentioned amongst the incidents but the transferor would nevertheless be entitled to them as title-deeds are incident to the possession under a freehold title (c). L. conveyed to plaintiff, by way of mortgage, certain land and deposited with him an indenture conveying the land from G. to T. and also a document purporting to be an indenture by which the land was conveyed by T. to L. This document was in fact a forgery. L. afterwards deposited with defendants, by way of equitable mortgage, a document purporting to be the conveyance from G. to T. but which was in fact a forgery, and also the genuine indenture of conveyance from T. to L. Held that the plaintiff might maintain detinue against defendant for the recovery of the latter indenture. The operation of the mortgage was to give to plaintiff property in all the deeds (d).

Transfer by operation of law.—The applicability of this section is confined to transfers by act of parties. Section 2, sub-section (d) excludes the operation of this section to any transfer by operation of law or by or in execution of a decree or order

- S. 8 of a Court of competent jurisdiction. A sale in execution of a decree is a sale not of the property but of such right, title and interest which the judgment-debtor has in the property (e). The section was held to be no bar to the vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money passing to the purchaser in execution (f).

A change of law, however, is not retrospective. In execution of a decree against the holder (by custom of primogeniture) of an impartible zemindari who was a member of a joint family, his right and title and interest was sold. By the law as then interpreted it was a limited interest subject to alienation in special justifiable causes. Subsequently the interpretation of law was reversed by the Judicial Committee which held that such a holder had an absolute estate. In a purchaser's suit it was held that the reversal of the previous accepted interpretation of the law did not displace its application to the contract contained in the certificate of sale, the parties were bound by the law as then understood and that only the life-interest of the then holder passed by the sale (g). All that passes at the auction is the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor. The purchaser is placed exactly in the shoes of the judgment-debtor as regards the land sold. As agricultural rents are not apportionable for they accrue once and for all at the time the crops are reaped and do not accrue day to day, there could be no question of apportionment and the purchaser is entitled to the rent, apart from section 8, and entirely on first principles (h). Neither section 8 nor section 36 of the Transfer of Property Act applies to agricultural rents. Both under this section and under section 65 of the Civil Procedure Code the purchaser in a Court sale is entitled to the property from the date of the sale and not from the date of the confirmation thereof (i).

Revenue sales.—Section 8 has no application to such sales. The rights of a purchaser at a revenue sale are entirely and radically different from those of a purchaser at a voluntary sale. In a sale under Act XI of 1859 (Land Revenue Sales Act), the estate is sold in the condition in which it stood at the time of the settlement; the purchaser does not derive his title from the defaulting proprietor, but takes the estate from the Crown in the state in which it was at the inception (j). The franchise of a ferry is not necessarily appurtenant to land (k). There is no statute law in India defining the mode of acquisition of ferry right. Where ferry rights across the river are settled by Government with one person he has a right to restrain another from running his ferry over the same spot unless he used it exclusively for the conveyance of his own servants and ryots (l).

Mines.—There is no definition of land in the Act, but ownership of land carries with it everything from the centre of the earth to the heaven above (m). The maxim is "Cujus est solum ejus est usque ad cælum ad inferos." Under the Settled Land Act, 1925 (n), land includes mines and minerals, whether or not held apart from the surface, buildings or parts of buildings. Hence a transfer includes all mines and minerals below the surface (o). But they do not include royal mines such as gold and silver. In such cases the ancient prerogative of the Crown remains unaffected, and the mine cannot be worked by a subject even on his own land, without the licence of the Crown (p). By statute (q), searching and boring hole and getting petroleum is prohibited to persons other than a person acting on behalf of or holding a licence from the Crown. In India as in England land includes on a transfer mines and minerals below the surface. What it includes is stated in the Land Acquisition Act (r) but that definition is restricted to that particular enactment and cannot be imported in this Act. But a "grant" in India has not the special and technical meaning attached to the same word in English Law. Minerals will not be held to have formed part of the grant in the absence of express evidence to that effect (s). Sub-soil rights in land forming part of a permanently settled zemindari are to be presumed at all events when they are not claimed by the Crown to belong to the zemindar. Proof of possession of the surface rights would not include sub-soil rights (t). The essential characteristics of a mokarari lease are occupation and enjoyment and unless there be, by the terms of the lease, an express or implied grant of mineral rights they remain reserved to the zemindar (u). In case of patni taluks the Calcutta High Court, following Ali Quadar Hossain v. Jogendra Narain Roy (v), which the Privy Council pointed out (w) was not overruled by that Board, held that where there was no express grant of underground rights, in the absence of any explicit reservation the grant of patni conveys all rights including underground rights which belong to the zemindar (x). Where the terms of the grant showed that there was no transfer of property in the soil, the intention being that the patnidar should be a leaseholder only, it was held that the patnidar and those claiming under him were not entitled to excavate the soil for the purpose of making bricks (y). Patni tenures generally are on the same footing as to sub-soil rights as other permanent heritable and transferable tenures created by a zemindar—that is to say, the sub-soil rights pass to the patnidar only when granted in express terms; general vernacular words signifying "with all rights" are insufficient for that purpose (z).

Land in a zemindari is to be presumed to be the property of the zemindar and held from him. It is well settled that as between a zemindar and a jaghirdar holding from him the zemindar is entitled to the minerals (a). It is well recognized that there can be separate ownership of different strata of the sub-soil, at all events where minerals are involved (b). In England almost every kind of clay of commercial use has been recognized as a mineral. Where title is founded on adverse possession the extent of possession enjoyed may be an inference of fact and in

- S. 8 applying the rule to the case of a mineral field regard is to be had to the nature of the subject and the possession to which it is susceptible. A coal company which held a mukarari lease of a village believed itself entitled to the subjacent minerals and carried on mining operations for twelve years. A suit by the zemindar claiming minerals under the village, was held barred by limitation as the company had been in adverse possession of the minerals for more than twelve years (c).

Right to dig shells.—Though a tenant of lands for the cultivation of paddy may, possibly, be justified in digging up shells from the land for the cultivation of the land in a proper and husband-like manner, the property in the shells so dug up is (in the absence of a local custom) not in the tenant but in the landlord, and the tenant has no right to convert them to his own use (d).

All things attached to the earth.—Used in connection with a transfer of land the phrase is defined in section 3. It occurs in section 108 (h) also. The English Law of fixtures has limited application in this country (e). And the English maxim "omne quod inædificatur solo cedit" has no application in this country (f). According to the definition of the words "attached to the earth," on a transfer of land, buildings would pass therewith unless the deed contains words shewing an intention to retain or exclude them (g).

The property in trees growing on land is by the general law vested in the proprietor of the land subject to any custom to the contrary. Under section 23 of the Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885) the onus is on the landlord to shew that a tenant with occupancy right is debarred from cutting down the trees on the land and not on the tenant to prove a custom giving him the right to do so. The right to appropriate them when cut down is a different question and the onus is on the tenant to prove the custom giving him the right to sell the trees (h). The Allahabad Court has held that when a tenant, either occupancy or a tenant at will, plants trees on his holding the property in those trees, in the absence of custom or contract to the contrary, attaches to the land and the tenant has no power of selling or otherwise transferring those trees (i). Trees being attached to the earth, are included in the legal incidents of the land and pass to the transferee under a deed of sale of the land on which they stand, unless a different intention is expressed or necessarily implied. No such intention is necessarily implied because the trees are mortgaged prior to the sale and no mention of the mortgage is made in the sale deed (j). The word "fixture" is of common use in English Law but it is not so familiar in India. The maxim "quid quid plantateur solo solo cedit" has never received so wide an application as in England, for anything to be a fixture it must be attached to the earth as that expression is defined in section 3 of the Transfer of Property Act. So where a shed consisting of pillars which supported a roof of tiles but was not fixed to the ground and merely rested by its own weight, was held to be a chattel and not a fixture (k). In the absence of a special agreement a Freehold and leasehold property.—The Act makes no distinction between freehold and leasehold for the purpose of the rule of law embodied in this section (m).

Debt.—The word “debt” in clause 5 of section 8 should be confined to such debts as fall within the general category of actionable claims (n). Prior to Act 2 of 1900 which amended Chapter VIII of the present Act, there was a conflict of decisions as to whether a mortgage debt was within the rule in section 8. To set the conflict at rest Act 2 of 1900 was passed by substituting a new chapter dealing with the transfer of actionable claims and inserting in section 3 a definition of “actionable claim” which excluded any “debt secured by mortgage of immoveable property or by hypothecation or pledge of moveable property.” Still controversy ranged around mortgages by deposit of title-deeds. In Perumal Ammal v. Perumal Naicker (o), Wallis, C. J., held that where the law still admits of the separate transfer of the mortgage debt as by the endorsement of promissory notes secured by a deposit of title-deeds or by attachment and sale in execution of a mortgage debt under the Civil Procedure Code, section 8 of the Transfer of Property Act still operates to carry the security with it. This view was, however, dissented from by the same Court which held that the endorsee for value of a negotiable instrument the amount of which had been secured by a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds cannot claim to enforce the mortgage in the absence of a registered instrument conveying the mortgage right to him (p). It may, however, be mentioned that Court sales of mortgage debts are governed by the special provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, and where a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds is accompanied by a promissory-note the deposit is merely a collateral security for the debt and a transfer of such a mortgage can be by endorsement of the promissory-note accompanied by re-deposit of title-deeds. The transfer of a debt without transfer of security came up for consideration before the Privy Council where their Lordships observed that the view, that as a secured debt was not within the definition of actionable claim a debt without security could not be made the subject of transfer at all, appeared to be creating disabilities not expressed in the Act and indeed were inconsistent with it for by section 6 of the Act of 1882 “property of any kind may be transferred except as otherwise provided by this Act or by any other law, for the time being in force.” The effect of the amendment in 1900 is to restrict the statutory rights on transfer such as the right to sue in the transferee's name, etc., to such transfers as are transfers of actionable claims as defined. There appears to be no difficulty in a transfer of a debt without the security; as the original debtor can always redeem, the relations between him and his original creditor are not altered. The transferee takes no further interest than the transferor was able to give him (q). A pledge is governed by section 176 of the Indian Contract Act (1872); there a creditor has two rights which are concurrent and the right to proceed against the property pledged is not merely accessory to the right to proceed against the debtor personally on the promissory-note. For the pledgee may have a right to sue for the property even in the absence of a right to sue for a personal decree. The same principles would apply to the case of hypothecation mortgages of move-

Ss. 8-9 able property (r). A charge under section 55, sub-section (4), clause (b) may be transferred together with its security (s).

Interest on a debt.—On a transfer of a debt arrears of interest accrued due before the transfer do not pass to the transferee.

Joint right.—A joint right in the sehdaries and a gateway, in the absence of reliable evidence to the contrary, raises a presumption that it passes on a transfer (t).

9. A transfer of property may be made without writing in every case in which a writing is not expressly required by law.

Oral transfer.

Generally.—A transfer of property may be made orally unless expressly required by law to be in writing. Prior to the passing of the Transfer of Property Act no writing was necessary for such transfers (u). After the passing of the Act certain specified transactions are required to be in writing (v). Title to the land cannot pass by mere admission when a statute requires a deed (w).

Exception.—The English doctrine of part-performance extended by the Privy Council to this country in Mahomed Musa's case (x) which subsequently found its way into section 53A of the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, violates the rule in this section under circumstances mentioned therein.

Writing necessary.—The Act requires transactions specified in sections 54, 58 (except mortgage by deposit of title-deeds), 105, 118, 122, 130 to be in writing. So also under section 5 of the Trust Act, II of 1882, transfers which parties desire to register must be in writing.

Writing not necessary.—An alienation needs no written instrument. It is sufficient if the person entitled to the property does an act which necessarily results in its transfer (y). All that the Act provides for is that certain specified transfers shall only be made in writing duly registered. An award relating to immoveable property need not be in writing (z). A compromise of disputes resulting in transfer of immoveable property (a), a partition of immoveable property (b), a transfer by possession followed by a deed of gift incomplete owing to absence of registration (c), and a transfer of land by husband to his wife during her lifetime in discharge of future maintenance may be made without writing (d), and so a surrender of lease(e).

Registration.—Transfers which are not expressly required by law to be in writing, if made in writing, are subject to the requirement of registration if they purport or operate to declare, assign, limit or extinguish a right, title or interest to or in immoveable property of the value of Rs. 100 and upwards (f).

Ss. 9-10

10. Where property is transferred subject to a condition or limitation, absolutely restraining the transferee or any person claiming under him from parting with, or disposing of, his interest in the property, the condition or limitation is void, except in the case of a lease where the condition is for the benefit of the lessor or those claiming under him; Provided that property may be transferred to or for the benefit of a woman (not being a Hindu, Muhammadan or Buddhist) so that she shall not have power during her marriage to transfer or charge the same or her beneficial interest therein.

Condition restraining alienation.

Sections 10, 11 and 12.—These sections grouped together forbid fetters on freedom of ownership.

Restraint against alienation.—The section answers the question whether a general restraint could be annexed to the alienation of property. In all cases absolute restraints are void even in the excepted instances of leases and married women. What the section exempts are transfers to married women (excluding those mentioned in the section) during marriage and conditions in leases for the benefit of the lessor. There is no objection to a transfer of property subject to a condition or limitation, only the condition or limitation must not be in absolute restraint of alienation. The right of voluntary alienation and liability to involuntary alienation are the natural incidents of an estate; with the free right of enjoyment co-exists the free and exclusive power of disposition (g). Equally inherent to this right is the liability to involuntary alienation. As long as the power of disposition subsists so long also is the property liable to attachment and sale to meet the demands of creditors (h). An incident of an estate which cannot be directly taken away or prevented by the donor cannot be taken away indirectly by a condition which would cause the estate to revert to the donor, or by a conditional limitation or executory devise which would cause it to shift to another person. Bankruptcy or judgment and execution effect an involuntary alienation. Can a fee simple estate be divested by an executory devise on that event? The liability of the estate to be attached by creditors on a bankruptcy or judgment is an incident of the estate, and no attempt to deprive it of that incident by direct prohibition would be valid. If a testator after giving an estate in fee simple to A, were to declare that such estate should not be subject to the bankruptcy laws, that would clearly be inoperative. This is the test.

The principle of the section is that the power of alienation which is necessarily incident to an estate in fee cannot be fettered by a subsequent condition. The two things are repugnant and cannot stand together and the original gift must prevail.

Persons affected by the section.—The restraint is on the transferee or lessee and not on the transferor or lessor. It must be for the benefit of the lessor but the section is silent as to whether it may be for the benefit of the transferor and presumably every such restraint must be so. A restraint for the benefit of the transferee or lessee is not within the scope of the section.

What is it which is void.—Under the section it is not the transfer which is void, it is the condition or limitation which is void as repugnant to the principle of the transaction upon which it is sought to engraft it.

Absolute restraint.—Just as general restraint of marriage was held to be bad but a partial restraint good, so in the same way although an absolute restraint was decided to be bad a restraint on alienation to one individual or his issue was thought not to be bad. In Muschamp v. Bluet (i) an attempt was made to introduce a converse condition, viz., that the devisee should alienate only to one individual named and that was held to be bad. Yet the principle of this decision was departed from in later times in Daniel v. Ubley (j) and Doe v. Pearson (k) followed by Attwater v. Attwater (l) before Lord Romilly, M. R., and finally in In re Macleay (m). These cases were of restraint of alienation except to a particular class of persons. In Daniel v. Ubley (j) the widow was to alienate to one of her sons. . . In Doe v. Pearson (k) the discretionary power of alienation was limited “to her sister or sisters or their children.” In Attwater v. Attwater (l) the injunction was never to sell the property out of the family but if sold at all “it must be sold to one of his brothers.” In Attwater v. Attwater (n) Lord Romilly, M. R., challenged the correctness of the decision in Doe v. Pearson (o) but Sir George Jessel refused to go contrary to it as it was decided as far back as 1805 and in In re Macleay (p) he followed the rule in that case and decided that the condition was a valid condition. There the devise was “to my brother J. on the condition that he never sells out of the family,” followed by gifts to other relatives. In re Macleay (p) was dissented from by Pearson, J., in re. Rosher, Rosher v. Rosher (q). There the learned Judge held that an absolute restraint against sale during the life of the widow though its operation was limited to a particular time was repugnant to the nature of an estate in fee. The same case was considered in re. Dugdale, Dugdale v. Dugdale (r), where the trust created for the benefit of a son was to cease and determine if by his own act or by operation of law he was deprived of the personal beneficial enjoyment of the premises in his lifetime with a gift over in trust for his wife or if no wife then living for his children equally. It was held that the son took an absolute interest under the gift and that the attempted executory gift over was void for repugnancy. In a recent case in Cockerill, Mackaness v. Percival (s) it was observed that Doe v. Pearson (t) and In re Macleay (u) were cases where partial restrictions have been held not to avoid the condition operating as a restriction on alienation. There the devisee was not restrained from selling to a particular person but from selling it to anybody except a particular person, creating a state of facts not found in any reported case in which a condition imposing partial restraint was treated as an exception to the general rule. Accordingly, the condition was held to be repugnant in accordance with the decision in Muschamp v. Bluet (v) and in Rosher, Rosher v. Rosher (w), on the ground of repugnancy. The following alienation were held void:—A devise with an earnest hope that the devisee would not sell except by way of exchange or for reinvesting in other estates (x). Absolute devise to A to cease if B or his wife or their children should become entitled to any part of the estate by gift, sale, etc. from A (y). The share of a nephew or niece in the testator's residuary estate to cease if he or she should alienate (z). A bequest of a stock to be laid in the purchase of an annuity for A to cease if he should sell (a). A gift to a son of real estate and shares to be held by trustees on the express condition that the son should not during his life have power to mortgage, sell, alien, charge or encumber any part of the same and in the event of his so doing the trustee should stand possession of his share upon trust for other persons (b). A testator left real estate to trustees with a direction that "the same shall not be disposed of or mortgaged or encumbered in any way whatsoever but shall remain for the benefit of my wife and children free from the control of their respective husbands and wives so that the same shall remain in my family from time to time for ever hereafter." (c).

Various modes of restricting alienation.—Every restriction, however limited in character, upon the right of alienation is not invalid in law (d). One has to say whether the case falls in any of the exceptions which have been allowed, such, for instance, as those admitted by Sir George Jessel in the much discussed case in re. Macleay (e), where a devise was "to my brother J. on condition that he never sells out of the family" followed by gifts to other relatives and the Master of the Rolls said, "Now you may restrict alienation in many ways. You may restrict alienation by prohibiting a particular class of alienation, or you may restrict alienation by prohibiting it to a particular class of individuals, or you may restrict alienation by restricting it to a particular time. In all those ways you may limit it, and it appears to me that in two ways, at all events, this condition is limited. First, it is limited as to the mode of alienation, because the only prohibition is against selling. There are various modes of alienation besides sale; a person may lease, or he may mortgage, or he may settle; therefore, it is a mere limited restriction on alienation in that way. Then again, it is limited as regards class; he is never to sell it out of the family but he may sell it to any one member of the family. It is not, therefore, limited in the sense of there being only one person to buy; the will shows there were a great many members of the family when she made her will; a great many are named in it; therefore you have a class which probably was large, and was certainly not small. There it is not, strictly speaking, limited as to time, except in this way, that it is limited to the life of the first tenant in tail; of course, if unlimited as to time, it would be void for remoteness under another rule. So that this is strictly a limited restraint on alienation, and unless Coke upon Littleton has been overruled, or is not good law, this is a good condition." Restrictions as to time and individuals are also recognized in this country.

This exposition, perhaps, tends to support the view that a restraint on alienation qualified as to time may be valid. These were the observations of Mookerjee, J. where a clause for restraint upon alienation by the reversioners in a deed of family settlement between two Hindu widows and the reversionary heirs, although held to be bad in view of section 11, was held to be binding on the alienees from the reversioners who had accepted a mortgage contrary to the provisions of the family settlement on the ground that the object of the restraint on alienation by the reversioners was for the protection of the widows to receive maintenance from what had been the estate of their husbands (f). A contract between two Shiah Mahomedans in compromise of a litigation provided that the female party thereto should be the absolute owner and free to make any transfer she pleased within the ambit of the family but not to a stranger. It was held that this was a partial restraint on alienation and was not repugnant (g).

On the same day as the deed of gift the donee executed a registered deed not to alienate the property without the knowledge, consent and permission of the donor and that if he did so he would return the property to the donor. It was held that the effect of the two documents was that on the happening of a specified event which did not depend on the will of the donor the gift should be suspended or revoked under section 126 of the Transfer of Property Act and that in this view the agreement did not contravene the provisions of section 10, there being no absolute restraint on the transferee (h). The same principle was applied to a Mahomedan gift prior to the passing of the Act (i). But a condition restraining the grantee from transferring the property to any person other than the grantor has been held to amount to an absolute restriction on the right of transfer and void (j). So also where alienation was permitted only on the ground of necessity (k). So also a right of alienation to be exercised only in favour of a certain class of persons and no others is a restraint and therefore void (l). Again, an absolute restraint limited to a period of uncertain duration is void (m).

As to leases, unless there is a restriction against alienation of a portion, a restraint upon alienation of the demised premises does not prevent an alienation of a portion (n).

Increase of rents.—A restriction against increase of rents is void (o).

Limitation.—In English Law the word defines the interest which a grantee is intended to take, that is “the extent of the feoffee’s interest should be ascertained by proper technical words. Thus if it were intended to convey an estate of inheritance to the feoffee it was essential that the gift should be made to him and his heirs,” This necessity of using the word heirs to mark out or limit an estate in fee seems to have been derived from the times before the alienation of land was freely permitted . . . and though tenants in fee simple were afterwards enabled to dispose of their lands so as to defeat the expectation of their heirs, the liberty so gained was treated as an incident to their estates so that what remained essential on the gift of a fee simple was to use apt words to confer an hereditary estate, to which the law would annex the power of alienation " (p). In re. Machu (q) it was said that the word "limitation" is ordinarily used to express a more general idea, viz., the definition or circumscription in any conveyance of the interest which the grantee is intended to take. The Indian Succession Act, while laying down rules of construction, mentions in sections 93 and 94 certain instances of limitations. The limitation of a remainder in tail or in fee simple to a person who had already an estate of freehold, as for life, was governed until 1926 by a rule of law known by the name of the "Rule in Shelley's case". This rule is abolished as regards instruments coming into operation on or after 1st January 1926. (r). The rule of Shelley's case is of feudal growth and not one applicable to India where deeds would be construed independently of the English rules of tenure.

Limitation of descent.—Lease was granted by a patta and an ekrarnama the latter deed providing that the lessee's daughter or daughter's son should not be entitled to succeed as heirs. It was held that a subject has no right to impose on land or other property any limitation of descent at variance with the ordinary law and that the proviso was void (s).

Creation of future interest.—The rule in the section affects the creation of future interest in property. It has no application to a charge where a present interest is created and there is no transfer of an interest in property which is merely made security for payment of money (t).

Family settlement.—Such a deed is not a transfer within the meaning of the section and restraint on alienation would be valid and enforceable when forming part of family settlement (u).

Hindus.—The principle underlying the section has been applied in the case of Hindus including married women (v).

Mahomedan Law.—The rule in this section has been applied to Mahomedans including married women (w). A settlement by a Mahomedan in favour of his sons "with all rights absolute" prohibiting alienations but giving to their descendants the right of alienation was held to confer an absolute estate (x).

Exemption.—Where an absolute interest is transferred the covenant in restraint of alienation is void (y) even though embodied in a separate instrument (z). The section makes two exceptions, one in the case of a married woman not being a Hindu, Mahomedan or Buddhist, the section permitting restraint on her power of alienation during marriage. The other exception is in the case of the lessor where

S. 10 the condition is for his benefit or those claiming under him. Restraints imposed by statute are not within the rule.

Annuity.—Annuity made payable personally to the judgment-debtor and charged on property may be attached and sold in execution. A clause making the allowance inalienable and payable only to the vendor is an illegal restraint on alienation. Such an annuity is not a mere right to receive future maintenance within clause (n) of the proviso to section 60 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (a).

Agreement by donee not to alienate.—On the same day as the deed of gift the donee executed a registered deed not to make a gift or transfer or sell or mortgage the property without the knowledge, consent and permission of the donor, and if he did so the property was to go to the donor. The two deeds forming part of the same transaction, were construed as not contravening the provisions of section 10 and that the case was covered by section 126 of the Transfer of Property Act (b).

Gift.—The incidents of a gift between Mahomedans are governed by their law and not by the Act. A provision in a deed of gift purporting to take away the donee's power of transfer being invalid under Mahomedan Law the donee takes an absolute estate (c), but a condition in a gift that the land was liable to be taken back if the donee transferred it, was held not to be repugnant on the ground that the gift was subject to a power of revocation (d).

Married woman.—Section 8 of the Married Woman's Property Act, III of 1872, deals with a wife's liability for post-nuptial debts. Section 10 of the Transfer of Property Act recognizes and renders enforceable conditions in restraint of anticipation and is not affected by section 8 of the Married Woman's Property Act. The income of property belonging to a married woman subject to a restraint on anticipation, accruing due after the date of a decree against such married woman's separate property under section 8 of the Married Woman's Property Act is not liable to attachment in execution of such decree (e). The exemption is, however, during the marriage and in favour of a woman not being a Hindu, Mahomedan or Buddhist. The Married Woman's Property Act extends to Sikhs and Jains as well. To section 8 of the Married Woman's Property Act a proviso has been added by section 2 of Act XXI of 1929 exempting from attachment and sale property transferred to a woman or for her benefit on condition that she shall have no power during her marriage to transfer or charge her beneficial interest therein. In interpreting section 8 of that Act the Calcutta High Court, in Hippolite v. Stuart (f), held that the terms of the section authorized judgment to be given even against separate property which was subject to a restraint upon anticipation. The Bombay High Court (g) though doubting, followed this decision. A dictum to the contrary of Farran, J., in the Bombay case was followed by the Madras High Court (h) which on a full consideration of the whole question declined to follow the Calcutta decision. However this may be, the question is now settled by the terms of section 10 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, and the proviso to section 8 of the Married Woman's Property Act. As explained by Sir George Jessel in In re Ridley Buckton v. Hay (i), restraint on anticipation is only a restraint on alienation and is an exception established by equity in favour of married women to the general rule of law which regards conditions in transfers of property restraining alienation as null and void. Whether the words are without any power of "alienation" or of "anticipation" the effect is the same (j).

Partition.—A right to partition is one of the incidents of ownership in property. A covenant making it impartible at all times to come is a restraint on alienation, it being settled law that as against parties not actually covenanting a restriction against partition is void (k). A clause in a deed of partition prohibiting alienation except with the consent of the other sharer is void as opposed to public policy (l).

Distinction between a contract for purchase or an option to purchase and a conditional limitation.—In London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm (m) Jessel, M.R., observed, that between these two there was in a Court of Equity no distinction. In each case there was the same fetter on the estate and on the owners of the estate for all time and the rules as to remoteness applied to one case as much as to the other. By way of example, he said: "Is there any difference in substance between the case of a limitation to A in fee with a proviso whenever a notice in writing is sent and £100 paid by B or his heirs to A or his heirs the estate shall vest in B and his heirs and a contract that whenever such notice is given and such payment made by B or his heirs to A or his heirs, A shall convey to B and his heirs?" The same rules applied where the option was given for charitable purposes, inasmuch as the interest of the charity did not become effective till the happening of the future event (n).

Pre-emption.—A clause in a deed of sale that if either party to the deed should wish to transfer the whole or part of his share to a third person the other party should have the right to pre-empt, is common in India having for its object the desire to keep out third persons. Such a clause, although not amounting to an interest in the land, entitles the parties to it to the benefit of the obligation arising out of the contract. It is not a restraint on alienation (o).

Premium.—A condition against transfer is often inserted merely as a foundation for a claim to nazar or premium when a transfer is made and if it is not void it does not render an assignment or transfer of the lease inoperative when there is no clause for re-entry (p).

Bequests.—Section 10 of the Transfer of Property Act applies to transfers inter vivos and not to testamentary dispositions (q). Restrictions imposing conditions repugnant to an absolute estate are void (r).

Compromise not a transfer.—The section is to be construed strictly and must not be used to defeat well recognized provisions. By a family settlement an estate contrary to law cannot be created but conditions may be introduced which though not valid in the case of other transfers would be enforceable when forming

S. 10 part of family settlements. A family settlement is not a transfer within the meaning of the section but is a recognition of pre-existing title or of conflicting claims (s).

A compromise or family arrangement is not a transfer of property as defined in section 5 of the Act. The distinction is pointed out by Lord Moulton in Musamm-mat Hiran Bibi v. Musamm-mat Sohan Bibi (t), where the compromise was held not to be an alienation but a family settlement in which each party took a share of the family property by virtue of an independent title which was to that extent and by way of compromise admitted by other parties. A clause in a compromise decree that a party thereto and his heirs shall have no power to alienate or encumber the property by gift, mortgage or sale, is no bar to the property being attached and sold (u). In a Lahore case it was held that a restriction contained in a compromise on the power of alienation is a derogation from the full proprietary rights and is consequently void (v). A Hindu executed three documents, described as mirash talukdari pattas and patni talukdari pattas, the former implying a permanent and heritable estate, the latter importing a permanent heritable estate subject to a fixed rent. By the said three leases he granted immovable property to his daughter, her sons and their sons successively and her daughters subject to a fixed rent with the right to transfer by sale or gift, according to conditions, namely, (1) that the properties were not to pass to the heirs of the grantee's daughters, (2) that they were not to be transferred by gift except to a limited extent for religious purposes, and (3) that the grantor and his heirs were to have a right of pre-emption in certain events; there was also a defeasance clause whereby the properties were to revert, upon a failure of the designated heirs of the grantee. The appellants contended that the leases conferred a series of life-interests, but that if the grantee took absolutely, the property passed to them, as heirs of the grantor, the grantee having died without heirs as designated.

Held, that as the words of gift in the second and third leases constituted the grantee malik and in the first equivalent words were used, the grantee took an absolute estate with power to transfer by deed or will, unless the context indicated an intention to the contrary, and that the conditions had not that effect. Conditions (1) and (2) appeared rather to be intended as conditions upon an absolute estate—so regarded (1) was void under Tagore v. Tagore (w), as an attempt to alter the legal course of succession, and (2) was void under Lalit Mohun Singh Roy v. Chuk-kun Lal Roy (x), as a repugnant restriction. The defeasance clause was void as it was not a valid executory gift, the event referred to being an indefinite failure of male issue; Soorjeemoney Dossee v. Denobundoo Mullick (y) distinguished. The condition as to pre-emption was disposed of by their Lordships as being inconsistent with the notice of an estate for life (z).

Punjab.—The section embodies an equitable principle which applies to the Punjab (a).

Crown.—Grant made by the Crown with a restraint on alienation is valid. The Crown Grants Act (XV of 1895) enacts that grants by the Crown of estates unknown to the law are not invalid (b).

Conditions in a lease for the benefit of the lessor.—Another exception to the rule enunciated in the section is made in the case of a lease provided the condition restricting alienation is for the benefit of the lessor or those claiming under him. The usual form of restraining a lessee is that he shall not assign, sub-let or under-let without the written consent of the lessor, followed by the phrase "such consent not to be unreasonably withheld." Unless on a breach of condition a right of re-entry is reserved to the lessor, a condition cannot be for his benefit, hence a condition in a lease restraining alienation not reserving to the lessor a right of re-entry would be void, and this is rendered clear by the amendment of section 111 (g) and the addition of section 114A by the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, wherein the word "condition" and not "covenant" is used.

In a lease, permanent or otherwise, when no right of re-entry is reserved a covenant against alienation is not operative. The principle is that the covenant is inconsistent with the interest sought to be created by the instrument and the assignment is operative notwithstanding the covenant (c), and on that footing the lessor is entitled to damages (d) and not to injunction or forfeiture of the lease. In dealing with clauses in restraint of alienation in leases, the Courts have construed them not as conditions but as covenants following Shaw v. Coffin (e), approved in Crawley v. Price (f), and distinguished from Doe v. Watt (g), where well-known words of condition are used. A power of re-entry reserved only to the lessor is wide enough to admit his "heirs, successors or assigns" (h). Where a lease was made before the Transfer of Property Act, the principles of law enunciated in sections 10 and 111 (g) were applied (i). A covenant in a lease provided that if the lessee sold any portion of the land or the trees one-fourth share of the proper value should be paid to the lessor otherwise the latter should not be bound and the sale should not be valid. It was held that this was a covenant running with the land and the purchaser was bound to pay the one-fourth share (j).

A similar principle was reiterated where the plaintiffs claimed to have acquired proprietary interest as well as several subordinate rights in certain lands. The defendants set up a title to the disputed land under a lease of 27th July 1901, granted by one N. D. In 1901 the sons of G.D. were the darpatnidars under a lease of 6th September 1886 by one J. M., who was a patnidar of a half share. The purport of the lease was to the effect that the darpatnidars should have full rights to grant leases and create encumbrances subject only to the restriction that if the darpatni was sold for arrears of rents the subordinate title created by the darpatnidar should at the same time come to an end. N. D., one of the sons of Gangaram, was appointed common manager of the estate, and as such granted, on the 27th July 1901, to the defendant's predecessors in title a permanent under-tenure. The darpatnidars having defaulted to pay rent, J. M. obtained a decree and in execution purchased the darpatni interest and such sale was confirmed on the 20th March 1905. The receiver of the estate of J. M. appointed by decree in an administration suit in respect of a half share without the permission of the District Judge, granted a darpatni to the plaintiff in 1906; it was held that the condition in the lease not being an absolute restraint on alienation and being for the benefit of the lessor, section 10 applied; that the restriction was one of the incidents of the under term and ran with the land so as to be operative not only between grantors and grantees but also their representatives in interest and the holders of derivative titles from them (k).

The mere existence of a condition in general terms against sub-letting is not of itself sufficient to prove that the condition is for the benefit of the lessor within the meaning of section 10. There must be something else either in the circumstances of the case or in the nature of the property or the wording of the lease from which it might be inferred that it was for the benefit of the lessor (l). A condition in a permanent lease restraining alienation is not void (m).

Involuntary alienation.—An assignment by operation of law is not per se a breach of a covenant against alienation. Weatherall v. Geering (n) may be quoted as an authority; also Doe v. Carter (o). In the same case the distinction is made between an alienation effected involuntarily by process of execution and a voluntary procuring of execution by the defaulting tenant against himself, in order to bring about the alienation desired. In this latter case it was held that an alienation so procured was a breach of the covenant. The restriction imposed by section 10 has no application to an involuntary alienation or alienation by operation of law such as an attachment and sale in execution of a decree (p). Sections 10 and 12 of the Act relate only to transfers by act of parties (q).

the beneficial enjoyment of another piece of such property, nothing in this section shall be deemed to affect any right which the transferor may have to enforce such direction or any remedy which he may have in respect of a breach thereof.

Where Act does not apply.—The rule laid down in the section is not peculiar to those provinces only in which the statute is in force (r).

Restriction repugnant to interest created.—The rule in the section applies to absolute and not to limited transfers though it has been observed by the Allahabad High Court that the principle of section 11 applies as much to mortgages or leases as to gifts or sales (s). It is an extension of section 10. According to section 10, on an absolute transfer no restriction can be imposed. This section further provides that the terms of the transfer shall not even direct that the interest of the transferee shall be applied or enjoyed by him in a particular manner. Hence, not only is an absolute restraint void under section 10 but on a transfer made absolutely you cannot direct the application or enjoyment of that interest in a particular manner. The section recognizes the elementary principle that a transferee of property who takes an absolute interest as, for instance, a donee or a purchaser cannot be restrained in his enjoyment or disposition of it by any condition inserted in the transfer. Such a condition deprives the property of its legal incidents and is inconsistent or repugnant to the main purpose of the transfer. It is consequently arbitrary and not enforceable in a Court of Law (t). The effect of the section is that when a man relinquishes his entire interest in the property reserving no right over it for himself or any other person, he cannot at the same time impose upon his transferee any condition restraining his enjoyment or disposition of the property. Such a condition is repugnant to law and will be disregarded; but where for the beneficial enjoyment of one piece of immovable property the vendor stipulates that the vendee should enjoy another piece of property in a particular manner, the case stands on a different footing (u).

By an agreement not to divide, a Hindu family could not tie up their family estate so as to deprive a purchaser of one of the shares of a right to enforce partition, as the law gives to a member of a Hindu joint family a right to demand partition from his co-members (v). But the members can bind themselves for their own lifetime and a similar agreement can be entered into by the remaining members of the family after one has demanded a partition and separated his share (w). As regards gifts, the rule in Mahomedan Law is that where a gift is made subject to a condition restricting alienation the condition is void and the gift takes effect as if no condition were attached to it (x). The incidents of a gift as between two Mahomedans are governed by the Mahomedan Law and not the Transfer of Property Act, 1882. A provision purporting to take away the donee's power of transfer being under the Mahomedan Law invalid, the donee will despite thereof take an absolute

5. 11-12 estate (y). According to Hindu Law a restriction against alienation in a gift of land to Brahmins is inoperative as being a condition repugnant to the nature of the grant (z). Similarly, the Bombay High Court held that a condition necessitating residence was only recommendatory and not enforceable at law. There was a gift imposing on the donee and his descendants in perpetuity the obligation not to lease the village without forfeiting the gift (a). And the Privy Council in a Calcutta case held void a restriction upon an absolute estate which attempted to alter the legal course of succession (b).

Amendment of the section.—The second paragraph of section 11 has been amended by section 8 of the Transfer of Property Act, 20 of 1929. Prior to the amendment the second paragraph was as follows :—“ Nothing in this section shall be deemed to effect the right to restrain, for the beneficial enjoyment of one piece of immoveable property, the enjoyment of another piece of such property, or to compel the enjoyment thereof in a particular manner.” The amendment was necessitated owing to the words “ to compel its enjoyment ” which found their way both in paragraph 2 of this section and in the first part of section 40 indicating that an affirmative covenant for the beneficial enjoyment of one piece of property of which the other piece has been transferred, can in all cases be enforced. The amendment was necessitated as the above paragraphs of the two sections were presumably based on the observations of Lord Cottenham in Tulk v. Moxhay (c), a case of an affirmative covenant disapproved in later English decisions such as Haywood v. Brunswick Building Society (d), an instance of a negative covenant and it is now settled that except in certain cases affirmative covenants cannot be specifically enforced. In Austerbury v. Corporation of Oldham (e), a covenant to spend money on land was held not binding on the purchaser who had notice thereof. The same principle had been followed in India (f). These principles do not apply to leases.

Affirmative and negative covenants.—Section 11 applies to affirmative covenants between transferor and transferee while section 40 to negative or restrictive covenants enforceable against third parties.

Indian Succession Act.—Section 138 of this Act is similar to section 11. It enacts that where an absolute bequest of a fund is followed by a direction that it shall be applied or enjoyed in a particular manner the legatee shall be entitled to receive the fund as if the will contained no such direction. The word “ fund ” includes legacies, both moveable and immoveable.

12. Where property is transferred subject to a condition or limitation, making any interest therein, reserved or given to or for the benefit of any person, to cease on his becoming insolvent or endeavouring to transfer or dispose of the same, such condition or limitation is void.

Condition making interest determinable on insolvency or attempted alienation.

Nothing in this section applies to a condition in a lease for the benefit of the lessor or those claiming under him.

Condition or limitation.—Section 12 is an exception to section 10. Under section 10 a partial restraint is not forbidden, but section 12 enacts that restraints of the nature enumerated in this section, though partial, will not be permitted and that a condition of a transfer that the interest thereby created shall determine on bankruptcy of, or attempted alienation by, the transferee is void. The rule in section 12 forbids conditions as to determination of an estate on a transfer of property on bankruptcy or attempted alienation. The law is different as to wills (g), for although a condition in a transfer inter vivos which determines it on bankruptcy or attempted alienation is void, it is not so under a will, provided there is a gift over in the absence of which the legatee or devisee takes an absolute estate so that such a clause in a will will have a similar effect as in a deed. The distinction pointed out by the Calcutta High Court (h) is not complete and falls short of the distinction as shown above.

Insolvency.—A condition in a deed of settlement that the interest of the beneficiary shall cease on his insolvency is void as it affects his creditors. In English Law a distinction is made, for the interest of the settlor himself cannot be qualified by a condition determining his interest on his own bankruptcy to the disappointment of his creditors, although on a transfer to a third party he may qualify the interest of the transferee with a similar condition (i). In settlements in English forms where a protected life-interest is given such a clause is permissible. But in India such a clause is void under this section. Further, under section 53 of this Act every transfer made with intent to defeat or delay creditors of the transferor shall be voidable at the option of any creditor so defeated or delayed and under section 9 (b) of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, III of 1929, it is an act of insolvency to make a transfer of property or any part thereof with intent to defeat or delay creditors.

Petition to be adjudicated insolvent.—Such a petition is in effect a voluntary transfer of interest in property to the Official Assignee and amounts to an alienation (j).

Effect of withdrawal of petition in insolvency.—A deed of settlement provided that in case any beneficiary should become insolvent, "or do or suffer anything whereby his share or any part thereof would through his act or default or by operation of law" become vested in or payable to other persons, then the share or interest of such person should cease and the income should be paid for the remainder of his life for the maintenance and support of the family of such person. In July 1894 plaintiff, a son of the settlor, filed his petition in insolvency and withdrew it on 8th December 1894. Held that the forfeiture clause did not take effect and the plaintiff was entitled to be paid by the trustees his share of the income of the trust property (k). Here the settlement was prior to the passing of the Transfer of Property Act and the Court regarded that the insolvency was not as contemplated by the settlor, for the withdrawal was within less than five months of the filing of the petition without the fund being in any way claimed or interrupted by the Official Assignee.

Endeavouring to transfer or dispose of.—According to this section a provision against an attempted alienation is void. A cesser clause of this nature is to be found in settlements created by deed or will. We are here concerned with settlements created by deed. The clause against which the section aims is a clause which in English Law gives a protected life-interest to an improvident child. The usual form of the clause is “Upon trust to pay the said income to my son (name) during his life unless and until either during my lifetime or after my death he shall have committed or suffered any act, default or process of law whereby such income or any part thereof if belonging absolutely to him would become vested in or payable to any other person or persons (and from and after the determination or failure of this trust in the lifetime of my said son)”(l). In India, an assignment of his life-interest by any person by act inter vivos or in execution is not void and the assignee, whether a creditor or purchaser, is entitled to the income thereof for the rest of the life of the tenant for life.

Membership of a voluntary association.—Membership in a voluntary association involves no transfer of property and the section does not apply. It was so held where a member of the Bombay Native Share and Stock Brokers' Association who having been declared defaulter was adjudged insolvent under the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, 1909. His card was claimed by the Official Assignee which claim was resisted on the ground that he had no interest which could pass to the Assignee as according to the rules a defaulter was expelled from the Association and whether the expulsion was before or after the commencement of the insolvency (m).

Provident fund.—The rule of the provident fund of a company provided that a member's claim to a fund arose only upon his discharge from service but that if during the service he attempted to transfer his interest his claim to the fund would be forfeited to the company. A member was adjudged insolvent on his own petition and subsequently discharged from the service. It was held that the above rule which determined the member's interest on an attempted alienation was void under the section and that his claim to the fund vested in the Official Assignee on the termination of his service (n).

Exemption.—The rule in the section excludes leases from its operation so far as it contains a condition for the benefit of the lessor or those claiming under him. A covenant in a lease to pay to the landlord one-fourth of the purchase money on a transfer is valid (o).

By the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, in section 111 (g) a new clause has been added whereby a lease of immoveable property is made to determine by forfeiture if a lessee is adjudged insolvent and the lease provides that on the happening of such event the lessor may re-enter. Both prohibitions referred to in this section are not only permissible in a lease but are usually inserted in a lease. A lessor may therefore provide that the lease shall be forfeited on the bankruptcy of the lessee or on an assignment, the latter condition is usually qualified by a clause that the assignment shall not be without the consent of the lessor, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld.

Evasion of the section.—The rule in the section can be evaded. For instance, where a settlor by deed has settled the income of, say, a sum of Rs. 10,000 on a child, he may make a gift to that child by will of a similar sum or larger sum and provide that in the event of the child assigning his or her right under the deed of settlement the gift under the will shall become void and go over to a person named. In that case the child is put to an election and if he elects under the will he imposes a self-restraint which does not trench upon the rule in the section.

Ss. 12-1

13. Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created for the benefit of a person not in existence at the date of the transfer, subject to a prior interest created by the same transfer, the interest created for the benefit of such person shall not take effect, unless it extends to the whole of the remaining interest of the transferor in the property.

Transfer for benefit of unborn person.

Illustration.

A transfers property of which he is the owner to B in trust for A and his intended wife successively for their lives, and, after the death of the survivor, for the eldest son of the intended marriage for life, and after his death for A's second son. The interest so created for the benefit of the eldest son does not take effect, because it does not extend to the whole of A's remaining interest in the property.

Settlement.—The rule in this section has been enacted to regulate settlements created by non-testamentary instruments as the illustration to the section shows.

Wills.—In the Indian Succession Act, XXXIX of 1925, a rule similar to the one enacted in this section as to non-testamentary instruments has been enacted in section 113 for regulating testamentary dispositions.

Child "in gremio matris."—By a rule now generally adopted in jurisprudence, a child in embryo at the date of the instrument who afterwards comes into existence is in contemplation of law in existence at the date of the transfer (p). Accordingly, the prior instrument may be for the benefit of such child (q).

Adoption.—Another exception to the rule that the subsequent transferee must be capable of taking at the time when the transfer takes effect on the determination of the prior interest is the case of an adopted son. A boy adopted on a man's death is in contemplation of law begotten by that man. Cases are frequently met with where an adoption is made on the day following the execution of a settlement whereby the adopted son takes the property on the determination of a prior interest (r).

Moveables.—Forming part of Chapter II, the section applies to both moveable and immoveable properties.

Remoteness.—The provisions of this section are enacted to prevent an attempt to create an interest in favour of future generations by declaring such a transfer,

- S. 13 if attempted, to be void for remoteness and such has been the law whether the case is governed by general principles or by the present section or by Hindu or Mahomedan Law if the operation of the section is excluded by section 2 (d) of the Act in their case.

When a transfer under the section is void.—On the ground of remoteness of limitation a transfer is void when (1) it is made in favour of a living person as required by section 5 of this Act, or (2) in favour of one not in existence at the date of the transfer subject to a prior interest, provided the latter interest extends to the whole of the remaining interest of the transferor in the property. By reason of the rule enacted in this section the words “living person” in section 5 includes a person not in existence at the date of the transfer.

Prior interest.—A prior interest is not effected by reason of the subsequent interest being rendered void by this rule (s). It is neither extinguished nor enlarged.

Subsequent interest.—The latest date when the subsequent transferee should come into existence is the date when the prior interest determines, for if at the date the prior interest comes to an end the subsequent transferee is a person not in existence on that date there would be a resulting trust. The period of gestation would be allowed.

Resulting trust.—Where a transfer offends the rule enacted in this section on the determination of the prior interest the estate reverts back to the settlor or his estate as the case may be, and there is a resulting trust in favour of the settlor under section 83 of the Indian Trust Act, II of 1882.

Absence of present interest in an agreement to grant land at request.—In compromise of litigation the proprietor of a hill agreed with a society of Jains that if the society should require a site thereon for the erection of a temple, he and his heirs would grant a site free of cost. The proprietor afterwards alienated the whole hill. The society by their representative sued the alienees for possession of a site defined by boundaries, alleging notice to the proprietor requiring that site, and that they had taken possession but had been dispossessed. Held that the action failed because the agreement conferred on the society no present estate or interest in the site and was unenforceable as a covenant since it did not run with the land and infringed the rule against perpetuities (t).

Hindu Law.—Under Hindu Law a gift or bequest to a person unborn is void. A donee must be a person in fact or in contemplation of law in existence and capable of taking at the time when the gift takes effect (u). The same rule has been enacted for transfers in section 13. But section 2 (d) excluded the operation of this section so far as it applied to Hindus prior to the amendment by Act XX of 1929. The amendment has not been given a retrospective effect. In consequence of the amendment, section 2 (d) does not exclude the operation of section 14 to Hindus. The Hindu Disposition of Property Act, XV of 1916, was enacted to remove certain then existing disabilities in respect of the power of disposition of property of Hindus for the benefit of unborn persons within certain prescribed limits. According to Hindu Law as then administered in British India, a gift or transfer in favour of a person not in existence was void. This Act enacted that within certain limits prescribed in Chapter II of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, no disposition of property by a Hindu by transfer inter vivos shall be invalid by reason only that any person for whose benefit it may have been made was not in existence at the date of such disposition. The Act is not retrospective. It extends to the whole of British India except the province of Madras. The Madras Act, VIII of 1921, applies to the town of Madras and Madras Act I of 1914 to the Presidency of Madras.

Mahomedan Law.—A gift or transfer of property to an unborn person is void under Mahomedan Law (v). The operation of section 13 in the case of Mahomedans is excluded by section 2 (d) of this Act. Moreover, the Mussalman Wakf Validating Act, 1913, enables persons professing the Mussalman faith to create wakfs which are in all respects in accordance with the provisions of Mahomedan Law, for themselves, their families, children and descendants for generation after generation, provided the ultimate benefits are reserved for the poor or other religious, pious or charitable purposes of a permanent character recognized as such by Mussalman Law. Prior to the Act (w) giving it a retrospective effect, the Courts in India held that the Act was not retrospective (x). What the law requires is that the properties must be substantially dedicated to charity and not that the gift to charity should be substantial.

Limited estate.—A limited estate cannot be created for the benefit of an unborn person even though it be subject to a prior interest in favour of a living person.

Maintenance and marriage expenses.—Provisions are met with in settlements wherein the interest created for persons not in existence is made subject to the maintenance of widows and marriage expenses of daughters of the family. Such provisions are valid under this rule provided they do not infringe the rule in the next section.

Trust how extinguished.—A trust which is void under this section may be extinguished with the consent of the person beneficially entitled. In the illustration A could extinguish the trust with the consent of his wife under section 77 of the Indian Trusts Act, II of 1882.

Time for ascertainment of facts.—The unborn person is determined on the termination of the prior interest, particularly when described in general terms as heirs, for until the prior interest determines the heirs of the settlor cannot be determined and it may be that such heir or heirs may be a person or persons living at the date of the transfer. Trusts as in the illustration would receive a different construction for in such cases the person taking the subsequent interest is determined at the date of the instrument.

The English rule of double possibility.—Though by rules of law an estate may be limited by way of contingent remainder to a person not in esse for life or as an inheritance, yet a remainder to the issue of such contingent remainderman as a purchaser, is a limitation unheard of in law nor ever attempted (y). This rule of law forbids raising of successive estates by purchase to unborn children, that is, to an unborn child of an unborn child (z). It applies to equitable (a) as well as legal

Ss. 13-14 estates (b). It was antecedent to and independent of the modern rule of perpetuities in respect of legal estates (c). This rule of law prohibiting the limitation after a life-interest to an unborn person of an interest in land to the unborn child or other issue of an unborn person is abolished (d).

14. No transfer of property can operate to create an interest which is to take effect after the lifetime of one or more persons living at the date of such transfer, and the minority of some person who shall be in existence at the expiration of that period, and to whom, if he attains full age, the interest created is to belong.

Rule against perpetuity.

Construction.—The Court struggles against a construction leading to the application of the rule and will avoid a construction leading to a perpetuity (e). The words “as near as the rules of law and equity will permit” would not by their own force have controlled the construction. B. devised freeholds upon trust for the use of E., his nephew, for life with remainders to the use of his first and other sons of the successive tenants for life in tail male and he bequeathed his residuary personal estate upon such trusts, etc., as were thereby declared concerning the devised freehold hereditaments “or as near thereto as the rules of law and equity would permit,” provided nevertheless that such residuary personal estate should not vest absolutely in any tenant in tail unless such person should attain the age of 21 years. Held the words that “as near as the rules of law and equity will permit” would not by their own force have controlled construction (f).

A Hindu settlor after distributing a portion of his estate settled the remainder in trust for himself for life and on his death one-fourth of the income was settled on his son R. for life and after his death to “all the male heirs of” R. share and share alike. A similar provision was made in favour of his daughter K. and her “male heirs” as well as his daughter P. and her “children.” The settlor died in 1894, K. died in 1897 leaving six sons who were in existence at the date of the settlement, R. died in 1908 leaving five sons existing at the same time and P. died in 1898 leaving a daughter also in existence at the date of the deed. The sons of R. filed a suit for construction of the trust deed which was held as intended to create a perpetuity as regards the properties (g).

For the longest period allowed by law.—Such an expression does not save a limitation but the instrument is void not on the ground of perpetuity but uncertainty as it is impossible to ascertain when the last life would be extinguished and it is therefore impossible to say when the period of 21 years would commence. A testatrix bequeathed a sum of £500 New Consols to trustees upon trust to apply the dividends thereof in maintaining and keeping in repair the tomb of her brother in Africa, “for the longest period allowed by law, that is to say, until the period of 21 years from the death of the last survivor of all persons who shall be living at my death.” Held that such a gift was void for uncertainty (h). cases is that property may be so limited as to make it unalienable during any number of lives not exceeding that, to which testimony can be applied, to determine when the survivor of them drops.

Presumption against child-bearing.—It has been laid down on many occasions that it is not permissible in determining rights in law to inquire into the capacity of a woman to bear children (i).

Uncertainty not perpetuity.—When a transfer is void for uncertainty it is unnecessary to consider whether it transgresses the rule against perpetuity (j).

Moveable property.—The section applies to moveable property being part of Chapter II rendered applicable by the Act to transfer of properties whether moveable or immoveable (k).

Wills.—A similar rule (l) prevails in case of wills with this difference, that in case of a non-testamentary instrument the validity of the interest created by the transfer of property is determined at the date of the instrument while in the case of a will in considering the validity of the bequest the state of the family at the death of the testator and not at the date of the will is to be regarded. A will is an ambulatory document having no force or effect until death of the testator (m).

The rule against perpetuities.—The origin and growth of the rule of law against perpetuities, based as it is upon public policy, is described in Cadell v. Palmer (n) and Thelluson v. Woodford (o). According to the rule every estate or interest must vest, if at all, not later than 21 years after the determination of some life in being at the time of the creation of such estate or interest and not only must the person to take be ascertained but the amount of his interest must be ascertained within the prescribed period (p). A perpetuity, as it is a legal word or term of art, is the limiting an estate either of inheritance or for years, in such manner as would render it inalienable longer than for a life or lives in being at the same time and some short or reasonable time thereafter. The 21 years are allowed because the law considers that time reasonable. The particular estate and the remainder must be created at one and the same time as making part of the same estate. This is undoubtedly the general rule. The law does not recognize dispositions which would practically make the property inalienable for ever. It is an equity doctrine, the invention of Chancellors, in favour of alienation, that property could not be tied up longer than for a life in being and 21 years after (q).

This is the rule against perpetuities. It started with limiting alienations to a life or lives in being, and later stretched to include the period of gestation. And in Stephens v. Stephens (r) the Court extended it still further to 21 years, saying that this would not create a perpetuity. There are two well-known rules to the vesting of all executing trusts and limitation. The one is that they must take effect within the period of a life or lives in being and 21 years after with a sufficient allowance in addition for the birth of a posthumous child. It is not sufficient that it may vest within that period; it must be good in its creation; and unless it is created in such

S. 14 terms that it cannot vest after the expiration of a life or lives in being and 21 years and the period allowed for gestation, it is not valid, and subsequent events cannot make it so. The other rule is that if at the time of its creation the limitation is so framed, as not, ex necessitate, to take effect within the prescribed period, that is, if it is bad in its inception, it will not become valid by reason of the happening of the subsequent events which may bring the time of actual vesting and taking effect within the prescribed period by law (s). The rule against perpetuities is that an executory trust or limitation not only may but necessarily must take effect, if it takes effect at all, within a life or lives in being and 21 years after, and if at the time of its creation the limitation is so framed as that an event can be named in which, if it should happen, the rule would be infringed, the limitation is bad. If, therefore, the limitations being known, an event can be pointed to such that if it happens the rule will be infringed, the limitation is bad. It is wrong and inconsistent with the decisions to affirm that if at the date of the instrument (in this case the will) the limitations are not known, but are to be determined in an indicated manner, the devise must fail because it may turn out when they are known that they infringe the rule against perpetuities (t).

Number of lives.—There is no restriction as to the number of lives to which an estate may be limited. The limitation of a term to several persons in remainder, one after another, if those persons were in being and particularly named, could in no wise tend to the creation of perpetuity (u).

Number of lives do not count whether three or twenty, as they are all spending at the same time, all the candles lighted up at once, all these limitations would be good; for in effect it is only for one life, viz., that which shall happen to the survivor (v). In such cases it is the vagueness of the statement as to the persons during whose lives the trust is to last that makes it an uncertainty and therefore void. In Thelluson v. Woodford (w), Macdonald, C.B., said as to the number of lives during which an executing devise is permitted by the rules of law, that it might be for any number of lives the extinction of which would be proved without difficulty.

Persons living at the date of the transfer.—The section does not require that the lives chosen under the section need be interested in the property for it is not material to restrain it to the life of the tenant for life. All that the section requires is that it should be restrained to a life or lives in being (x).

Minority.—The legal period under the rule for a limitation is life or lives in being and the minority of some person who shall be in existence at the expiration of the period and to whom if he attains full age the interest created is to belong. In India, both under the Succession Act and the present Act the rule is that the minority must be of the person interested. In English Law this is not necessary (y). Unlike the fixed rule of 21 years in England, the law here has stretched the period of limitation to minority. Minority in India is regulated by the Indian Majority Act, IX of 1875.

Equitable interest in land.—Although the Act does not recognise equitable interests in land, contracts for conveyance of land stand in a class by themselves and if they purport to do indirectly what the law forbids to be done directly they are void, and the principles applicable are the same in India as in England (z).

All possible contingencies.—It should be borne in mind that in construing a covenant from the point of view of the doctrine of perpetuities or to test it on the ground of remoteness it is the invariable practice of the English Courts to pay regard to all possible contingencies and not to actual events only (a). And this practice has been followed in the Indian Courts (b). It has been laid down with great force on many occasions that it is not permissible in determining rights in law to inquire into the capacity of persons to beget or bear children (c).

Immediate parties.—A covenant which is affected by the vice of remoteness is void and ineffectual even as between the immediate parties thereto (d).

Period of gestation.—A child en ventre sa mere is in contemplation of law treated as being alive (e). There is no fixed rule of construction which compels a Court to hold that a child was born in the lifetime of the testator because it was at that time en ventre sa mere. That peculiar rule of construction is limited to cases where that construction of the word "born" is necessary for the benefit of the unborn child, as decided by Lord Westbury, L.C., in Blasson v. Blasson (f).

The English authorities relating to the construction of the words "life in being" in the rule against perpetuities establish this, that in construing the rule a child en ventre may be deemed a "life in being" and the period of gestation might be added at both ends of the period of 21 years mentioned in the rule as this trifling prolongation of the period during which property may be tied up did not in any way bring about the mischief against which the rule was directed (g). But the extension is for the benefit of such child only and not for any third person.

The whole of such years and months is not to be taken in gross. The Court considered 21 years as the limit and the period of gestation to be allowed in those cases only in which gestation exists (h).

Vesting suspended for more than 21 years.—If the interest of an unborn child of a person in being does not vest when that unborn child attains 21 the gift is too remote and void and the limitations over are void also (i).

Exceptions to the rule.—This rule has no application—third in trust for J., and as to the remaining one-third upon trust to pay the income to H. If not then a member of the Roman Catholic Church or of any sisterhood or until she should become a member of either and subject as aforesaid as to capital and income to T. and J. W. died in 1893 and H. became a member of a sisterhood in 1895. Held, in accordance with the dicta in Boughton v. James (b), that the appointment was not open to objection on the ground of remoteness (c).

Limitations following a limitation void.—It has been held many times that limitations depending or expectant upon a prior limitation which is void for remoteness is invalid. The reason appears to be that the persons entitled under the subsequent limitation are not intended to take unless and until the prior limitation is exhausted; and as the prior limitation which is void for remoteness can never come into operation, much less be exhausted, it is impossible to give effect to the intentions of the settlor in favour of the beneficiaries under the subsequent limitation (d). And so is a life-interest given to a living person dependent upon an event which may transgress the rule invalid (e). But limitations in default of appointment under a power which is void for remoteness are not necessarily invalid unless they are themselves obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities (f).

Void restrictions on valid limitations.—The principle cannot be disputed that if the first estate in the order of succession is not void for remoteness; if it is a good estate it would not be affected by the fact of the successive estates being void on that account but the first or prior estate would not be benefited by the failure of the successive estates (g). Testatrix, in pursuance of a power in her marriage settlement, appointed a fund to her son C. for life, with remainder to his eldest son, provided that, in the event of their refusal to comply with a request by her son A. to release their interests in certain other property their interests in the fund were to go over to her son A. absolutely. Held the condition was void as being contrary to the rule against perpetuities (h).

Future husband or wife.—A testator made a provision in his will as follows, "In case any of my said children shall marry and have issue and any such child or children and his, her or their issue shall all die in the lifetime of any husband or wife with whom any of my said children shall have so inter-married then I give the share or shares of my said children respectively unto such other of my said children as shall be then surviving and to the respective issue of such of them as shall be then dead. It being my will and mind and full determination that none of the son's wives or daughter's husbands shall become heirs to their children's property." It was held that the gift over in case any of his children and their issue should die in the lifetime of any husband or wife with whom his children should have inter-married was too remote (i).

Covenant for pre-emption.—Such a covenant, prior to the Transfer of Property Act at any rate, was within the mischief of the rule against perpetuities (j).

A covenant binding one party and his successors to sell to another and his successors is a covenant unlimited in point of time and therefore not enforceable (k).

Instances in which the Courts have refused to enforce such or similar covenants when they were sought to be enforced by or against the successors in interest of the covenantors themselves are common (l).

Contract for transfer of immoveable property.—A contract for the sale of immoveable property is a contract that a sale of such property shall take place on terms settled between the parties. It does not of itself create any interest in such property and is therefore not within the rule against perpetuities (m).

Section 14 applies as much to contracts for transfer as to actual transfers though section 54 enacts an important distinction between the two. The rule against perpetuities vitiates the offending covenant from end to end. The words of section 14 are "no transfer can operate to create an interest." The agreement cannot be split up into two parts, viz., that which would create an interest and therefore valid and the other which may not create an interest. The covenant is forbidden by law and is absolutely void even in part and void ab initio, and this whether the covenant is between the immediate parties or their successors, and they come within the mischief of the rule. Prior to the Transfer of Property Act the Indian Legislature recognized that a contract for the sale of immoveable property as under English Law created an equitable interest in the property and made the purchaser the owner in equity. And this followed from illustration (g) to section 3 and illustration (a) to section 13 and section 27, clause (b) of the Specific Relief Act, I of 1877, also section 17, clause (2) of the Registration Act, XX of 1866, and section 17, clause (b) of the Registration Act, III of 1877. The only decision of the Privy Council on the subject is Maharaj Bahadur Singh v. Balchand Choudhury (n). Where the proprietor of a hill had in 1872 agreed with a society of Jains that if the latter required a site thereon for the erection of a temple he and his heirs would grant the same free of cost and thereafter alienated the hill in favour of a third party. The society then sued the alienees for possession alleging that they had given notice to the proprietor requiring the site and further alleging that they had taken possession but had been dispossessed. The Judicial Committee held that such a covenant as this cannot and does not run with the land and could not be so enforced. Further, if it could be regarded in another light, viz., an agreement to grant in future whatever land might be selected which is a site for a temple, as the only interest created would be one to take effect by entry at a later date and as this date was uncertain, the provision offends the rule against perpetuities. This pronouncement is sufficient authority for the proposition that a covenant for pre-emption prior to the Transfer of Property Act, at any rate, was within the mischief of the rule against perpetuities. The Madras High Court in Ramasami v. Chinnan Asari (o), while dealing with the case of a more restricted power of a Hindu by virtue of clause (d) of section 2 of the Transfer of Property Act, doubted whether the English doctrine of perpetuities and section 14 of the Transfer of Property Act which applied to transfer of interest in land would apply to contracts for sale of land in India, observing that there was really no substantial difference between English and Indian Law in respect of contract of sale of immoveable property and it did not seem reasonable and in accordance with the principles of general jurisprudence that there should be some limit of time beyond which the performance of contracts for the transfer of property by way of sale, pre-emption or otherwise must not be allowed to be held in suspense or postponed. In India, on the one hand, a substantive law of property, viz., Transfer of Property Act, IV of 1882, does not recognize equitable interest in land and the rule of English Law that the contract for sale of real property making the purchaser the owner in equity of estate has no application to those parts of India where the Transfer of Property Act is in force (p), while on the other hand section 27 (a) of the Specific Relief Act recognizes that contracts with regard to land can be specifically enforced against third parties in certain cases. Section 91 of the Indian Trust Act also lays down that a transferee taking with notice of a prior contract in favour of another, must hold the right obtained under the transfer as a trustee for the previous promisee. A series of judicial decisions has settled the view that contracts of this description, if they purport to do indirectly what the law forbids to be done directly, are void and the principles applicable to them are the same in India as in England. In the latter country, what may now be considered to be the leading case on the point is that of London and South Western Railway Co. v. Gomm (q), where the Court of Appeal held that an option to purchase gave an equitable interest which was within the rule against perpetuities. The authority of this is supreme at the present moment and it is unnecessary to deal with subsequent decisions which have explained or followed this principle (r). Another principle that should be borne in mind is that in construing a covenant from the point of view of the doctrine of perpetuities or to test it on the ground of remoteness it is the invariable practice of the English Courts to pay regard to all possible contingencies and not to actual events only (s), and this practice has been followed in Indian Courts (t). Now contracts of pre-emption admit of different varieties according as the promise is made by one person in favour of another or by one person for himself and his heirs, etc., in favour of another or in favour of another and his heirs, etc., and there may be also further varieties caused by the promise on the side being made by one person or by one person for himself and one person for himself and his heirs and so on. There is nothing inherently wrong or objectionable in a contract between persons tying up property for a limited time for a definite purpose or for the sake of mutual convenience. To a personal contract the doctrine of perpetuities or of remoteness has no application (u). On the other hand, a covenant binding one party and his successors to sell to another and his successors is a covenant for pre-emption unlimited in point of time, and has been held not enforceable in numerous cases in different Courts in this country. So a case where A and B respectively for themselves and their heirs for all times agreed to a right of pre-emption for each other and their heirs, is bad as offending the rule against perpetuities and on the ground of remoteness. It is a covenant which amounts to an agreement to convey immoveable property upon happening of an event which might occur at a more remote period than the lives in being and

- S. 14 18 years afterwards (v). Instances in which Courts have refused to enforce such or similar covenants when they were sought to be enforced by or against the successive interests of the covenantors themselves are common. Amongst such instances may be cited a case in which a conveyance executed by the plaintiffs in favour of the defendant's father it was provided that if the latter sold the property subsequently he would be bound to give preference to the plaintiff and the covenant was sought to be enforced against the defendants who were the sons of one of the contracting parties (w).

In Nabin Chandra v. Rajani Chandra (x), a Hindu transferred certain immovable property to his son-in-law, reserving a condition that if the transferee or his successor found it necessary to sell the property he must sell it to the vendor or his nephew or his heirs at a specified price and the son of the son-in-law having sold the property to strangers the nephew unsuccessfully sued for enforcement of his right of pre-emption. In Kolathu Ayyar v. Ranga Vadhyar (y), a covenant of pre-emption between two persons was sought to be enforced against the heirs of one of them and the Court observed that one who had obtained a promise for the conveyance of the land had by virtue of section 27 (b) of the Specific Relief Act and section 91 of the Trust Act "a substantial interest in it." This case was later distinguished by the same Court which held that a contract to reconvey whenever demanded was personal and that it created no interest in land and was not void under this rule (z). In a recent case the Madras High Court while dealing with a counter-part agreement by the purchaser on the same day as the sale deed to convey the land to the vendor on his paying the sale price in a limited period mentioned in the agreement, on the ground that such an agreement did not create any interest in land, held that the undertaking by the purchaser was not a mere standing offer but an executory contract giving a right to the vendor to get a conveyance from the purchaser, that it was assignable by the vendor and was not void as offending the rule against perpetuities (a). In a Bombay case (b) the dispute was for right of pre-emption in favour of the vendor and his heirs against the purchaser and his heirs where on an originating summons the covenant in question was held void as offending the rule of perpetuities. The agreement was of 18th September 1878 and being prior to the Transfer of Property Act, was regarded as creating an equitable interest in the property.

A similar agreement prior to the Transfer of Property Act was held to create an equitable interest in the property. There, in execution of a decree against the plaintiff's father, land belonging to him was sold at a Court sale and purchased by an auction purchaser who sold it to defendants' father on 14th May 1874. The latter on the same day agreed to reconvey the land to a brother of the plaintiff on payment of a certain sum of money. It was held that the agreement was void as offending the rule against perpetuities (c). A later Full Bench decision of the same Court held that the sale passes the title absolutely to the purchaser and the agreement to resell in no way limits his right as owner (d). The Allahabad High Court has held that a contract of pre-emption was not void for uncertainty nor as being opposed to public policy, neither did it offend the rule against perpetuities, inasmuch as it did not create an interest in immoveable property (e). A contrary view has been taken by the Patna High Court that a covenant for pre-emption unlimited in point of time was void as offending the rule (f). But the same Court has held that a covenant in a mortgage creating a right of pre-emption in favour of the mortgagee the operation of which is not to extend beyond the lifetime of the parties is not obnoxious to the rule (g).

Hindu Law.—The section prior to the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, did not apply to Hindus by virtue of section 2 (d) as it then stood. Now this section applies to Hindus. Further, the Hindu Disposition of Property Act, XV of 1916, makes provision for the application of limitations described in Chapter II of the Transfer of Property Act to transfers inter vivos by Hindus. This Act applies to British India except the province of Madras where the Madras Act I of 1914 is enacted for the Presidency of Madras and for the town of Madras Act VIII of 1921. An agreement between coparceners never to divide certain property is invalid under Hindu Law as tending to create a perpetuity (h). Under sections 14, 16, 17 and 18, non-charitable dispositions, void for perpetuity, will not be validated by the presence of charitable trusts (i).

Mahomedans.—The section does not apply to Mahomedans. Under the Mussalman Wakf Validating Act of 1913 made retrospective by Act XXXII of 1930, it is lawful for a person professing the Mussalman faith to create a wakf of his property which is in all respects in accordance with the provisions of the Mussalman Law by settling the same for the benefit of his generations in perpetuity for the maintenance and support, wholly or partially, of his family, children or his descendants or where he is a Hanafi Mussalman for his own maintenance and support till his life, provided that the ultimate benefits are reserved for the poor or a purpose recognized by Mahomedans as pious, religious or charitable of a permanent character.

Clause for re-entry in a lease.—A clause entitling the lessor to terminate a permanent lease at any time does not offend against the rule of perpetuities (j).

Covenant for renewal of lease.—A covenant in a lease for renewal from time to time at the option of the lessee is not void as being in violation of this rule. Covenants for renewal differ from covenants for pre-emption in regard to this rule (k).

A covenant in a lease that if the lessee or his representative intended to transfer the whole or any portion of the lease the transfer would be made in favour of the lessor for a proper price offends the rule against perpetuities. Cases of pre-emption stand on their own peculiar law (l).

Where a lessor by a patni pattah after easing a mauzah exempted from its operation certain lands and covenanted that on certain contingencies happening the lessee should acquire a right thereto as patnidar but no time was specified within which the contingency was to happen in order to vest the right in the patnidar,

S. 14 held such a covenant was void as offending the rule even as between the parties to the covenant (m).

"Interesse termini."—Interesse termini, which a reversionary lease (say for a term to commence more than 21 years after its date) confers on the lessee, is not an executory but an immediate vested interest. Such a reversionary lease therefore does not offend the rule against perpetuities (n).

Lease in perpetuity.—A. executed in favour of W. an ijara lease for a term of years which contained the following covenant on the part of the lessor, "If out of the Ijara Mehal you require any land for the purpose of erecting any indigo factory or silk factory or excavating any bund or tank or for construction of any cutchery house I shall grant you a Mourasi Mocurrari Pattah for it on proper rent." It was held that the lease was valid and that the covenant did not infringe the rule against perpetuities (o).

Contract of indemnity.—A security bond was executed by a third party to a purchaser undertaking to compensate the latter with equivalent lands in case the purchaser or his representative was deprived of possession. It was held that the bond was only a covenant for indemnity and not a covenant for title; that a covenant for indemnity was not one running with the land and therefore not enforceable and even if such property was rendered permanently liable to the purchaser or his assigns it would be unenforceable as offending the rule against perpetuities (p).

Transaction not amounting to a transfer of interest.—The rule in the section does not apply to a transaction which does not amount to a transfer of interest. An agreement to pay maintenance allowance to a person and to continue to pay the same to his descendants from generation to generation making it a charge over the property creates a charge and not a mortgage and does not offend the rule (q).

"Cy pres" doctrine.—A settlor made a trust in the following words:—"To expend after the liquidation of all the debts the sum of Rs. 500 per month for such medical and educational charities within the zemindaris of the settlor as shall with the approval of the settlor appear just to the trustee." He died before approving any trust and the zemindari was sold before any charitable trust was selected by the trustees. It was held that the conditions precedent to the constitution of the trust were not satisfied and it failed.

The question whether a charitable trust, if otherwise valid, is vitiated by the rule against perpetuities was left open, but it was pointed out that the preponderance of authority was for the proposition that the doctrine of cy pres was applicable only in wills and not in deeds.

Between the applicability of the cy pres doctrine and the failure of a charitable trust for the non-satisfaction of a condition precedent, the distinction is that in the former there is the breakdown of the machinery required to carry out validly-created charitable trusts and in the latter there is the initial failure of the conditions essential to bring the trust into existence (r).

Indefinite failure of issue.—Two brothers, K. and N., subject to the Dayabhaga School of Hindu Law, executed on 28th March 1866, a document whereby after reciting that, "whereas body is mortal it is impossible to say what may befall at what time, and as ruin may ensue from disputes relating to the shares arising in future among son, daughter, daughter's son and childless widow unless some rules are regularly framed, and it has accordingly become necessary to prescribe a set of rules in that behalf, and hence the rules mentioned below are laid down : these shall become operative and come into force on our death," they purported to provide for the permanent devolution of their respective properties in the direct male line, including adopted sons, with the condition that in case of failure of lineal male heirs in one branch the properties belonging to that branch should go to the other, subject to the same rule, and only in the absence of male descendants in the direct line in either branch were the properties to go to female heirs and their descendants. K. died in 1868, leaving a son A., a daughter D., his brother N., and their mother C. A. died in 1872 without any issue and C. in March 1901. The plaintiffs (appellants), who were the sons of D., instituted this suit on 29th July 1901, against N. claiming as next reversioners to A., their maternal uncle, the properties which originally belonged to K. and which had since come into the possession of N., the defendant. N. died shortly after the suit was brought, his sons (the respondents) being substituted for him on the record. Their contention was that under the instrument of 1866 the properties in dispute passed on the death of A. to N. and on his death to them.

The Judicial Committee held that the clear intention of the instrument of 1866 was to vary the rules of Hindu Law and to control the devolution of the properties until the indefinite failure at some remote period of the male line of K. and N., and that such an attempt to alter the mode of succession was, on the principles laid down in the case of Jatindra Mohan Tagore v. Ganendra Mohan Tagore (s), illegal and void. Throughout the instrument there was no indication of an intention to make a gift to any person; and there was no warrant for the contention that there was a devise in favour of A. with a gift over to N., his uncle. The question was not whether the gift was good in the event which happened, but whether it was good in its creation (t).

Powers.—General powers are exempt from the restriction of this rule for there exists, by the existence of the power, a present, immediate and unrestrained alienability. Particular or special powers such as a power to appoint among a named class of persons differ from general powers in that the donee has not an unrestricted power of alienation and in that case the rule against perpetuity requires that all limitations made in pursuance of the power shall be such only as would have been valid if inserted in the original will or settlement. When the power is exercised the limitations created under it are to be written into the instrument which created the power and if and so far as they do not exceed the rule against perpetuities they are good (u).

Sections 13 and 14.—Both sections deal with limitations on disposition and aim at setting bounds to the disposing power of property laying down restrictions against the natural wishes of men to perpetuate property in their own families. Section 13 deals with remoteness of limitation while section 14 prevents property from being chained longer than the period prescribed therein and enacts that the vesting must be within the compass of life or lives in being and the minority of a person who shall be in existence at the death of the survivor. Section 13 dealing 14-15 with remoteness enacts that a transfer of property may be made in favour of an unborn person subject to a prior interest provided that such unborn person takes the whole of the remaining interest of the transferor in the property. This section leaves it open to allow the estate to remain in abeyance or suspense between a prior interest and the taking effect in favour of an unborn person so that any number of years may elapse between the extinction of a prior interest and the interest in favour of an unborn person taking effect. To guard against this abuse tending to perpetuate the property in the family section 14 enacts that a settlor shall not lock his property for a greater period than a life or lives in being and the minority of a person who shall be in existence at the death of the longest survivor. In either case the law's anxiety is to set a restraint on alienation.

Sections 14 and 15.—By a deed of trust dated the 27th April 1921, C. D., settled various properties on trust for himself and his family and after his death, the trustees were directed to pay Rs. 20 per month “to the daughter or each of the daughters, if more than one, for and during the term of her or their natural life and lives, commencing from the date of her or their marriage.”

Held, that the principle in Leake v. Robinson (v) applied to Hindus, and, in the case of a gift covered by section 14 of the Transfer of Property Act, section 15 of the Act applies, subject to it being shown that there is some rule of Hindu Law at variance with that section. Section 3 (a) of the Hindu Disposition of Property Act does not exclude the application of section 15 of the Transfer of Property Act, in a case which is covered by section 14 of the Act. Therefore the gift to the daughters was bad (w).

Transfer for benefit of the public.—The restriction in this section does not apply when a transfer of property is made for the benefit of the public in the advancement of religion, knowledge, commerce, help, safety or any other object beneficial to mankind (x).

15. If, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created for the benefit of a class of persons with regard to some of whom such interest fails by reason of any of the rules contained in sections 13 and 14, such interest fails in regard to those persons only and not in regard to the whole class.

Transfer to a class
some of whom come under sections 13 and

Changes in the section.—The section being a rule of construction was modelled on the rule of construction laid down in Leake v. Robinson (y) and settled by antecedent decisions. The old section laid down that when there was a transfer to a class of persons with regard to some of whom the transfer could not take effect owing to the vice of remoteness or as offending the rule of perpetuity the interest created for the benefit of the class failed as regards the whole class. Leake v. Robinson (y) was a case of construction of a will making bequests not to individuals but to a class. The Court had to determine whether the class could take and the Master of the Rolls said, “I must make a new will for the testator, if I split into portions his general bequest to the class, and say, that because the rule of law forbids his intention from operating in favour of the whole class, I will make his bequests, what he never intended them to be, viz., a series of particular legacies to particular individuals or what he had as little in his contemplation, distinct bequests, in each instance, to two different classes, namely, to grandchildren living at his death, and to grandchildren born after his death."

By the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, the words "as regards the whole class" have been substituted by the words "in regard to those persons only and not in regard to the whole class," thus departing from the rule in Leake v. Robinson (2). Prior to the amendment the persons belonging to the class stood or fell together.

The reasons for amendment.—The Special Committee in their report explain the reasons for amendment as follows:—"Section 15 of the Transfer of Property Act deals with a gift to a class. It reproduces with slight verbal alterations the provisions of section 102 of the Indian Succession Act, 1865 (now section 115 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925), which was enacted on the principle of the decision in Leake v. Robinson (2).

Prior to certain special Acts, to be presently noted, Hindu Law did not permit a gift in favour of a person who was not in existence at the date of the gift or a bequest in favour of a person who was not in existence at the death of the testator (Tagore v. Tagore (1872) 9 Beng. L. R. 377, 397, 400, I. A. Sup., Vol. 47) on the ground that a person capable of taking must be in existence at the material date. Difficulties, however, arose where a gift was made to a class of persons of whom some were and some were not in existence at the date of the gift. The leading case on the subject is that of Rai Bishen Chand v. Mussumat Asmaida Koer (a), wherein a Hindu made a gift of his property to his grandson S. who was then in existence "and his (S.'s) brothers who may be born thereafter." It was argued on the strength of the rule in Leake v. Robinson and the analogy of section 102 of the Indian Succession Act, 1865, that as the gift to the unborn grandsons was invalid according to the Hindu Law, no benefit could be taken even by the grandson who was in existence at the date of the gift. But this contention was overruled by the Judicial Committee.

The true scope of the rule in Leake v. Robinson was pointed out by Sir Lawrence Jenkins in Radha Prasad v. Ranimoni Dasi (1911) 38 Cal. 188, affirmed in 41 I. A. 176.

The rule that a Hindu could not dispose of his property by gift or sale in favour of an unborn person fettered the free disposition of property. To remove this disability three Acts were passed, namely, (1) Madras Act I of 1914, (2) the Hindu Disposition of Property Act, XV of 1916, and (3) Madras Act VIII of 1921. The Madras Act I of 1914 applies to the Madras Presidency except the town of Madras; the Madras Act VIII of 1921 applies to the town of Madras; and the Hindu Disposition of Property Act extends to the whole of British India except the province of Madras.

Class.—A gift is said to be to a "class" of persons, when it is to all those who shall come within a certain category or description defined by a general or collective formula, and who, if they take at all, are to take one divisible subject in certain proportionate shares (b). A gift to all the children of testatrix "with the exception of one, viz.," has been held not to be effected by the incomplete exception (c).

The gift to the class is not defeated by the words which follow as the testatrix had not made up her mind whether she would except any of her grandchildren or Transfer to take effect on death of lineal descendants.—Such a transfer offends the rule in the section and is therefore void. The fact that it happened to fall within the legal period is not the test. What you have to see is whether the events can be postponed to beyond the period of a life or lives in being and 21 years after and not what in fact happened. A sale deed of a 9-pie odd share minus the 2 bighas specifically numbered stated as follows:—"Let this be known that the bighas of nankar land which I have excluded from the sale shall remain in my possession for life and after my death in the possession of my aulad khas without payment of rent or Government revenue. I or my lineal descendants have no right to transfer the property excluded either permanently or temporarily. If none of my lineal descendants is alive in my family then the said land shall be declared to be the own property of the vendee and his heirs and the persons of my family shall have no claim to the same." It was held that the transfer offended the rule laid down in section 15 (e).

Hindu Disposition of Property Act.—In section 3, clause (a) for the words and figures "sections 13, 14 and 20" the word and figure "Chapter II" have been substituted so that the present section applies to Hindus. The Calcutta High Court decided before the amendment that section 3 (a) did not exclude the application of section 15 of the Transfer of Property Act in a case covered by section 14 of the Act (f).

Wills.—Testamentary dispositions are governed by section 115 of the Indian Succession Act which corresponds with section 15 of the Transfer of Property Act. The former section, also based on the rule in Leake v. Robinson (g), has been amended on the same lines as the present section by section 14 (1) (a) of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Supplementary Act, 21 of 1929. The rule in Leake v. Robinson (g) was held not to apply to a Khoja will.

16. Where, by reason of any of the rules contained in sections 13 and 14, an interest created for the benefit of a person or of a class of persons fails in regard to such person or the whole of such class, any interest created in the same transaction and intended to take effect after or upon failure of such prior interest also fails.

Transfer to take effect on failure of prior interest.

Amendment.—This section has been amended by the Transfer of Property Act, 20 of 1929. As owing to the amendment made therein section 15 will no longer provide for the case of a failure of transfer, reference to it has been omitted in section 16. But a transfer may fail as to all the members of a class by reason of sections 13 and 14 as where a gift over is intended to take effect after a prior gift in favour of a class and the prior gift fails. To make this clear section 16 has been amended by the addition of the words "an interest created for the benefit of a person or of a class of persons fails in regard to such person or the whole of such class" before the words "any interest."

Subsequent limitation.—The rule in the section which is one of construction enacts that if a subsequent limitation depends upon a prior estate which is void the subsequent limitation must fall together with it (h). The reason appears to be that the persons entitled under the subsequent limitation are not intended to take unless and until the prior limitation is exhausted; and as the prior limitation which is void for remoteness can never come into operation, much less be exercised, it is impossible to give effect to the intentions of the settlor in favour of the beneficiaries under the subsequent limitation. For further notes refer to notes on section 14 under the caption "Limitation following a limitation void."

Invalid power of appointment.—It is settled that any limitation depending or expectant upon a prior limitation which is void for remoteness is invalid but limitations in default of appointment under a power which is void for remoteness are not necessarily invalid unless they are themselves obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities (i).

Independent and alternative limitations.—If a subsequent limitation is not dependent upon the other it might then take place notwithstanding the first was bad. If a limitation is made dependent on the happening of either of two events one of which is too remote but the other is not it will take effect if the latter event happens (j). When the ultimate gift is independent of the original gift and is an alternative gift which comes into operation on an event which can be determined and fixed within the limits of the rule in sections 13 and 14 it is valid.

The invalidity of one alternative will not necessarily defeat the other (k).

The void alternative is disregarded (l).

Benefit.—This covers expenditure which does not strictly come under the heads of "maintenance" or "education" (m).

Indian Succession Act.—Section 116 enacts a similar rule. See the illustrations to it.

Transfer for benefit of the public.—The restriction in this section does not apply when a transfer of property is made for the benefit of the public in the advancement of religion, knowledge, commerce, help, safety or any other object beneficial to mankind (n).

such direction shall, save as hereinafter provided, be void to the extent to which the period during which the accumulation is directed exceeds the longer of the aforesaid periods, and at the end of such last-mentioned period the property and the income thereof shall be disposed of as if the period during which the accumulation has been directed to be made had elapsed.

and such direction may be made accordingly.

Changes in the Law.—The present section 17 is substituted (o) in place of the old section 18. According to the old section, accumulation for a period of one year was allowed in certain cases. This worked great hardship, because even in England a much longer period was allowed, and in certain cases restriction against accumulation was not applicable at all. According to the new section, therefore, accumulations are allowed for longer periods than was originally allowed by the old section 18 and in three cases exceptions are made permitting accumulations.

Part of the income.—The direction for accumulation may be of the whole income or part of it.

Wills.—Subject to the three exceptions enumerated, section 117 of the Indian Succession Act, XXXIX of 1925, forbids accumulation. Section 57 makes this section applicable to Hindus. Prior thereto they were governed by the Hindu Wills Act, which made applicable to them certain portions of the Indian Succession Act of 1865. Section 104 of that Act dealt with the effect of directions for accumulation contained in a will. This was omitted in the Hindu Wills Act and it therefore became necessary for the Courts to examine whether a direction to accumulate was contrary to the provisions of Hindu Law. As early as 1841, the Supreme Court of Calcutta thought it competent to a Hindu testator to provide for the accumulation of the surplus income of his estate within the limits allowed by law (p). After this followed two other cases (q) which although they did not decide that a direction to accumulate was good it is clear from them that the practice of directing accumulation was of long standing and that at the time it was considered that such a direction would have effective operation. There is nothing illegal in a direction to accumulate unless it be against public policy or for an illegal object or inconsistent with Hindu Law (r). A direction to accumulate for the marriage expenses of the testator's son (s) or till a boy to be adopted attained the age of 18 (t) was upheld. A direction to accumulate for 99 years was held bad (u) but it obviously offended the rule against perpetuities and so a direction which aimed at postponing the enjoyment of a presently vested interest created by the testator's will failed for repugnancy (v). So far the cases present no difficulty but in Amrito Lall Dutt v. Surnomoni Dasi (w), Trevelyan, J., said, "I cannot see how a direction to accumulate can be valid unless there be a present gift to support the direction to accumulate." The other members of the Bench declined to express an agreement with this view. If, as the decisions above cited imply, it was within the power of a Hindu testator to direct the accumulation of property then there would seem to be no difficulty in the way of making a gift of it to a person who under the same gift may become entitled to the original corpus of the testator's property. The result of the authorities is that a direction to accumulate is not contrary to Hindu Law, for so long a time as an absolute vesting of the entire interest can be withheld, or for so long a time as that during which the corpus of the property can be rendered inalienable or its course or its devolution can be directed and controlled by a testator (x). A direction in a will to accumulate the income till the boy to be adopted attained the age of 16 years, was not a direction to accumulate it for ever and could not be treated as infringing the law as to perpetuities (y).

A trust for perpetual accumulation is, however, void. A Hindu testator attempted to create a trust for accumulation for 99 years of the surplus income of his estate in the purchase of zemindaris from time to time and empowered the trustees to continue the trust after the expiration of the 99 years' term. The will contained no disposition of the beneficial interest in the zemindaris so to be purchased. The trust was held void (z).

A trust was held to have failed as creating a perpetuity, where a testator directed the interest to accumulate till the aggregate sum was Rs. 3 lakhs to be transferred to and divided amongst his sons and the survivors or survivor together with the descendants of such of them as may be deceased, per stirpes and as soon as the new accumulation arose in the hands of the trustees the same be again in like manner divided (a).

Mahomedan Law.—A provision for accumulation which will enure solely for the benefit of charitable purposes will not be bad as offending the rule of perpetuities. The performance of Fateha (distribution of alms to the poor accompanied with prayers for the welfare of the souls of deceased persons), which so far as it involves Principle of the section.—This section is framed on the lines of English Law now consolidated in sections 164-166 of the Law of Property Act 1925 (c) which re-enacts with certain alterations, the Accumulation Act of 1800 known as the Thellusson Act (d), which is not an enabling but a disabling Act. Prior to the passing of that Act an accumulation could be directed for any period provided it did not violate the perpetuity rule. The section has been enacted to restrict accumulation and to prevent settlors from taking full advantage of the liberty which they had to tie up property for successive lives. It only permits accumulation in respect of two periods, viz., life of the transferor and an alternative period of 18 years from the date of the transfer. A transferor may direct accumulation for the life of himself or 18 years from date of transfer, whichever be the longer of the two. He is not bound to mention only one of the two periods, which are alternative and not cumulative. It also permits accumulation as to three objects which are specified in sub-section (2), viz., (a) payment of debts of the transferor or person taking interest under the transfer, or (b) provisions for raising portions for children or remoter issue of the transferor or any of the other person taking an interest in the transfer, or (c) preservation or maintenance of the property transferred.

Void to what extent.—The effect of an invalid provision is to render void accumulation which exceeds the longer of the two statutory periods. In the event of a direction for accumulation exceeding the longer of the two statutory limits, the accumulation for the entire period is not void but only so far as it infringes the period allowed by the statute.

Illustrations.

(a) A settlor by deed directs accumulation for 25 years and himself lives for 40 years, from the date of the transfer. The accumulation for 25 years is good.

The property and the income thereof shall be disposed of.—In the event of the accumulation being directed for a period longer than either of the two permitted limits the accumulation will be allowed till the longer of the two periods permitted by the section expires and at the determination of such period the property and the income shall be disposed of as directed on the expiration of the accumulated period.

Illustration.

A settles property in trust for B and directs it to be delivered to the latter with the accumulated income at the end of 25 years. A dies five years after the settlement, the property shall be delivered to B with the accumulated income at the end of 18 years from the date of the instrument.

Life estate.—The restrictions as to accumulation imposed by the section relate to all classes of interest created by deed. If an interest is given to a person for life no accumulation of income of the whole or part which infringes the rule laid in the section will be permitted. The section does not recognize any accumulation being made other than for the three objects excepted as also during the two periods permitted. The words "transfer of property" used in the section are defined by section 5 to mean an act by which property is conveyed by a living person in present or in future to one or more other living persons, or to himself, or to himself and one or more living persons. This definition is wide enough to cover trusts and settlements so that a person obtaining a life estate under a settlement would be included in section 17.

At the end of the last mentioned period.—These words refer to the words of the section immediately preceding them, viz., "the longer of the aforesaid periods."

Effect of an invalid direction.—In case of an absolute gift a trust for accumulation which exceeds the prescribed period is rejected as to the excess and the gift takes effect free from such excess (e). When the primary gift is not absolute the effect is not to accelerate the interest of those who take subject to such trusts (f). If a trust for accumulation has been allowed to continue after the statutory period for accumulation there would be a resulting trust of the income arising during the forbidden period in favour of the settlor and if he be dead it will revert to his estate (g).

Exceptions within certain limited periods.—The section deals with restrictions as to accumulation but provides two periods during which and three objects for which a condition as to accumulation shall be held valid. With regard to the periods, the section first contemplates the case of a man who settles property otherwise than by will, in which case he may direct that the rents and profits be accumulated during his life. The settlor cannot direct an accumulation during his life and some further period. The second of the two periods contemplates an accumulation which is to commence from the date of the settlement and to last for a period of 18 years thereafter. No such accumulation is to go on for more than 18 years. The two periods are alternative and not cumulative. The settlor can select one of the two and not attempt to add one to the other so that the accumulations cannot be permitted to be endured during both the periods (h). Therefore when one period has been applied and exhausted a second period cannot be applied in order to extend the time for accumulation (i).

Debts within the exception.—Debts may be secured (j) or unsecured, may be present, future or contingent (k), may be due by the transferor or a stranger (l), but the exception will not include a provision for accumulating income to recoup capital applied in discharge of a debt (m). A trust for payment of debts unlimited in duration is not void (n). The provision for payment of debts must be bona fide (o). After debts are satisfied the accumulation can only be for the statutory periods and subject to the statutory restrictions.

Portions for children.—These are within the exception to the prohibition against accumulation. A portion means a sum of money secured to a child out of property, out of the income of which, a provision is made for the parent (p). They are not restricted to children in existence but include remoter issue who may be children coming into existence afterwards (q). It includes portions directed to be raised by an instrument other than the trust which contains a clause for accumulation (r). The law as to accumulation in England prior to its repeal by the Law of Property Act, 1925, was the Accumulation Act, 1800, known as the Thelluson Act.

Preservation or maintenance of the property transferred.—This exception provides for the accumulation of income in respect of the maintenance or preservation of the property which forms the subject-matter of the transfer. This is commonly found in trusts and settlements of immoveable properties where the settlor makes a provision that a certain definite proportion of the income should be allowed to accumulate as a reserve fund for the purpose of repairing the property should occasion arise. The rule which prevents accumulation beyond the two permitted limits does not apply to such a case. The provision, however, must be made for repairs, that is, keeping up the property in good and tenantable condition, commonly known as the sinking fund. A direction to lay out money for building houses on the land would be within the section whilst improvements which in substance could be regarded as "maintaining in good habitable repair houses and tenements on the property would be outside the accumulation clause" (s). The provision must be in respect of the property transferred.

Transfer of property for benefit of the public.—Transfers of property for the benefit of the public in the advancement of religion, knowledge, common health, safety, or any other object beneficial to mankind are not within the restrictions imposed by this section (t). The meaning of public purposes is wider than charitable purposes.

Savings out of income.—Savings out of income are not within the operation of the section and therefore trustees are not prevented by reason of this section from making accumulations on savings (u).

Presumed intention of the Act.—It must not, however, be supposed that the Act prevents accumulation during minority or the respective minorities of beneficiaries under the settlement or even successive accumulations, for instance, accumulation during the life of the transferor and thereafter for the benefit of the child during minority may be made. Here there are successive accumulations to be made of what practically, if not theoretically, is the same fund, which accumulations taken together may last a considerable time. These periods may when added together amount to considerable time yet the periods in question are not really within the vice against which the Act is directed. A settlement may be made directing accumulation during the life of the transferor and thereafter a life-interest may be given to a child. In such a case the life of the transferor may lengthen out for more than 50 years at the end of which a child may be born who may not attain majority till 21 years after the settlor's death and therefore accumulation would go on for 71 years. When a beneficiary is of full age a trust for accumulation operates to postpone his enjoyment, but in the case of an infant his inability to give a receipt would in any case postpone his enjoyment during his minority. A man may direct a settlement of property upon A. for life and after his death upon his children on attaining 18 years and if he goes on to provide that during the minority or respective minorities of his children the income of the property shall be accumulated, it is only a clause in common form the validity of which has never been doubted (v). The restrictions apply to a lunatic (w).

Instances where the section does not apply.—The section does not apply to a direction to keep up a policy on foot (x), or to property situate in foreign lands to which the Act does not apply (y), or when funds are settled by a foreign settlement (z), or where the settlor is domiciled in a foreign land to which the Act does not apply, though he settles a fund in the land to which the Act applies (a) or to savings of income.

Law of Property Act, 1925.—Section 164 runs as under:—

(1) No person may by any instrument or otherwise settle or dispose of any property in such manner that the income thereof shall, save as hereinafter mentioned, be wholly or partially accumulated for any longer period than one of the following, namely:—

- (a) the life of the grantor or settlor; or
- (b) a term of 21 years from the death of the grantor, settlor or testator; or
- (c) the duration of the minority or respective minorities of any person or persons living or en ventre sa mere at the death of the grantor, settlor or testator; or
- (d) the duration of the minority or respective minorities only of any person or persons who under the limitations of the instrument directing the accumulations would, for the time being, if of full age, be entitled to the income directed to be accumulated.

In every case where any accumulation is directed otherwise than as aforesaid, the direction shall (save as hereinafter mentioned) be void and the income of the property directed to be accumulated shall, so long as the same is directed to be accumulated contrary to this section, go to and be received by the person or persons who would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed.

(2) This section does not extend to any provision—

(i) for payment of the debts of any grantor, settlor, testator or other person

(ii) for raising portions for—

(a) any child, children or remoter issue of any grantor, settlor or testator ; or

(b) any child, children or remoter issue of a person taking any interest under any settlement or other disposition directing the accumulations or to whom any interest is thereby limited ;

(iii) respecting the accumulation of the produce of timber or wood ; and accordingly such provisions may be made as if no statutory restrictions on accumulation of income had been imposed.

(3) The restrictions imposed by this section apply to instruments made on or after the twenty-eighth day of July eighteen hundred, but in the case of wills only where the testator was living and was of testamentary capacity after the end of one year from that date.

In case of direction for excessive accumulation the law is different in India and in England. Suppose A. makes a settlement of his property directing accumulation for 100 years and dies at the end of 19 years after the date of settlement. In such a case the accumulation would be good for the life of the transferor which is the longer of the two periods permitted by the section. On death of the settlor, "which would be the end of the last mentioned period," the property and the income, according to the section, is to be disposed of as if the 100 years during which the accumulation had been directed had elapsed. Now under the English Act, section 164, a direction contrary to the four periods permitted therein is altogether void. Further, the Indian Act provides that at the end of 19 years the property and the income shall be disposed of as if the period had elapsed.

Sections 14 and 17.—Except within certain limits specified, both sections aim against tying up in perpetuity, the one, of lands, and the other, of the income arising therefrom.

18. The restrictions in sections 14, 16 and 17 shall not apply in the case of a transfer of property for the benefit of the public in the advancement of religion, knowledge, commerce, health, safety, or any other object beneficial to mankind.

Transfer in perpetuity
for benefit of public.

Changes in the section.—Mention of section 15 has been omitted and section 17 has been added. Reference to section 15 has been omitted both from the present section as well as section 16 in view of the fact that as amended it no longer provides the case of a failure of a transfer. Section 17 has been added as restrictions as to accumulation are not to be applicable to charities. It has already been pointed out that in India, although infringing the rule against perpetuities, Hindu and Mahomedan religious endowments have been upheld (b).

Private charities.—The section does not apply to charities in which the public are not interested.

Resulting trust.—Section 83 of the Indian Trusts Act (II of 1882) enacts “where a trust is incapable of being executed, or where the trust is completely executed without exhausting the trust-property, the trustee in the absence of a direction to the contrary, must hold the trust-property or so much thereof as is unexhausted, for the benefit of the author of the trust or his legal representative.”

Illustration (c) to the section is as follows :—

(c) A conveys land to B upon trust to sell it and apply one moiety of the proceeds for certain charitable purposes and the other for the maintenance of the worship of an idol. B sells the land, but the charitable purposes wholly fail and the maintenance of the worship does not exhaust the second moiety of the proceeds. B holds the first moiety and the part unapplied of the second moiety for the benefit of A or his legal representative.

Indian Succession Act.—Section 118 of this Act, while controlling bequests to religious or charitable uses enumerates, by way of illustrations, the following examples of religious or charitable uses: (1) relief of poor people, (2) maintenance of sick soldiers, (3) erection or support of a hospital, (4) education and preferment of orphans, (5) support of scholars, (6) erection or support of a school, (7) building and repairs of a bridge, (8) making of roads, (9) erection or support of a church, (10) repairs of a church, (11) benefit of ministers of religion, (12) formation or support of a public garden.

Charity.—The purposes mentioned in the section are charitable purposes or objects for the public benefit. The word “charity” is not defined by the Act but it must be understood in the sense in which lexicographers use it and not in any way connoting anything which English lawyers understand by that term. The English cases upon the technical meaning of the word “charity” are no guide nor are we concerned with the preamble of the English Statute, 43 Eliz., c. 4.

In England, under the Statute 43 Eliz., c. 4, the word “charitable” has a specific meaning much wider than its natural signification, and the statute may be referred to for the definition of what is “charitable.” In order to ascertain what are charitable purposes, recourse is usually had to the preamble of the Statute 43 Eliz., c. 4, which preamble has been reproduced in the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act (1888) (51 and 52 Vict. c. 42), though the latter enactment otherwise repeals the former. In Commissioners for Special Purposes of Income-tax v. Pemsel (c), it was held that the word “charity” is by no means limited to the exact forms of it enumerated in the Statute of Elizabeth and that in its legal sense it comprises four principal divisions, viz :

- (1) trust for the relief of poverty ;
- (2) trust for the advancement of education ;
- (3) trust for advancement of religion ; and
- (4) trust for other purposes beneficial to the community not falling under any of the preceding heads.

But in India there is no such statute and it must not be assumed that the word “charitable” in both countries represents the same category of interests.

"Such charitable or public purposes as my trustee thinks proper."—Such a direction, by the House of Lords, has been held as void for uncertainty (d). It is in effect giving someone else power to make a will for him instead of making a will for himself. The Bombay High Court has held that a gift by will of the residue to "such charities as the trustees may think deserving" is a good gift, the objects being wholly charitable (e), following Moggridge v. Thackwell (f), in which it was held that where the execution is to be by a trustee with general or some objects pointed out there, the Court will take the administration of the trust. The Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Nagpur has held such a bequest void (g).

Christians.—It has been held that a devise for the support of hospitals by an Englishman was a valid devise and one to which the Court would give effect as being a charitable trust within the scope of 43 Eliz., c. 4. The Statutes of Mortmain not being applicable to India, the Court will carry out such a trust when the subject is immoveable property just as it would if it had been personal property (h). In British India a bequest for a purpose which is charitable within the meaning of that term in English is valid and the Indian Trusts Act, 1882, will apply to it. But if it is a devise in the alternative for purposes which are not charitable though benevolent or philanthropic then it is void (i).

Hindus.—Under Hindu Law, even prior to the Amending Act of 1929, if there was a valid dedication for religious purposes it was not invalid because it transgressed the rule forbidding the creation of perpetuities. A Hindu idol is capable of being endowed with property and no express words of gift to such idol in the shape of trust or otherwise are required to create a valid dedication (j). The establishment of an image and the worship of a Hindu deity are valid charitable objects (k). A direction to spend the income in feeding poor indigent Hindus is valid (l).

So also a trust for the performance of ceremonies and giving feast to Brahmins is valid (m).

The establishment and maintenance of a sadavarat, the building of a well and cistern for animals to drink water from, have been held to be charitable objects (n).

A direction for distribution of an ascertained sum amongst poor relatives, dependents and servants as also a gift to a University, are valid charitable objects (o).

Where there was a Hindu temple with dharماسala and sadavarat attached to it and the surplus funds not required for the service of the temple were to be applied for feeding travellers and maintaining a sadavarat, it was held that the intention of the founder was to devote the property to public religious and charitable purposes (p).

To feed the really needy and poor, to spend for the annual sraddhas or anniversaries of the father, mother and grandfather, the feeding of Brahmins, expenditure for marriage of daughters of poor and of the poor Brahmins and towards the education of the sons of the poor as the trustee shall think fit, are valid charitable purposes (q).

Giving of alms for the testator's spiritual benefit is void for uncertainty (r).

Trust for the performance of Durga and Lakshmi Pujahs are valid (s).

Gifts to hospitals are valid. The institution to be benefited need not be a corporate body. It is sufficient if there be some responsible authority charged with the general administration of the funds of the institution (t). A bequest for feeding Brahmins on the day following the night of Sivratni is valid (u). Offerings by followers of the Radha Swami religion to the spiritual head do not constitute a charitable trust (v).

Mahomedans.—Transfers by a Mahomedan for the benefit of the public are governed by the Mussalman Wakf Validating Act, VI of 1913, made to operate retrospectively by Act 32 of 1930. The application of the rule in this section is excluded by section 2 of the present Act. As wakfs, transfers for the following purposes have been held valid religious and charitable purposes or objects.—Fateha and kadam sharif (w), the celebration of the birth of Ali Murtaza, the expenses of keeping tazias in the month of Muharram, the anniversaries of the deaths of members of the waqif's family and the expenses for repairs of imambara (x), the expenses of the annual fateha of the waqif, of her husband and members of her family, the annual expenses of burning lamps in a mosque and the salary of hafiz and readers of Koran (y).

A trust for the benefit of the poor for aiding pilgrimages and marriages, and for the support of wells and temples are charitable objects (z).

Dedication for the upkeep of and other ceremonies at a private tomb is not valid, it being neither religious nor charitable (a), unless it has relation to shrines and tombs of great religious teachers and saints (b), nor is the reciting of Koran over the tomb of a private person (c).

Parsis.—Trusts and bequests of lands or money—for the purpose of devoting the incomes thereof in perpetuity for the purpose of performing muktd, baj, vejushni and other like ceremonies, are valid "charitable" bequests (d).

Trust for 'masses.'—In England these trusts were at one time held bad under the effect given to the Statute of Edward VI and on general grounds of public policy as being superstitious. The question whether or not this was part of the law brought by the English into India was answered in the negative as to Hindus in Advocate General v. Vishvanath (e), as regards Christians in Andrews v. Joakim (f), and as to Armenians in Colgan v. Administrator General of Madras (g).

A recent decision of the English Court has held that a gift for the saying of masses is charitable as being for the advancement of religion, (1) because it enables a ritual act to be performed which is the central act of religion of a large proportion

Idol, not moveable property.—There may be purposes for which an idol, considered with reference to the material substance of which it is composed, may be regarded as moveable property. But an image considered as a legal or spiritual entity cannot properly be said to be the subject of gift (i).

Dharam.—A gift to dharam is void (j). The objects which can be considered to be meant by that word are too vague and uncertain for the administration of them to be under any control (k). The law on this point is the same in the mofussil as in the Presidency towns (l).

Kherat.—The word kherat is used by Mahomedans as dharam is used by Hindus as expressing alms or charity. Cases are met with where Mahomedans have used the words dharam and kherat together, which may be construed as a composite phrase. But these words are synonyms, one derived from the Sanskrit and the other from the Arabic, the former probably due to Hindu ancestry, the latter to Islamic religion. It cannot, however, be said that the vagueness of the word dharam is clarified by its conjunction with the more definite term kherat; for it might with equal justice be said that the definiteness of the word kherat is obscured by the word dharam nor is it easy to concede that kherat is a definite term. A bequest so made was considered void for uncertainty by the Bombay High Court (Crump, J.,) where the parties were Borahs (m), but a bequest for dharma-kriya was held valid by Mirza, J., where the parties were Cutchi Memons (n).

Limitation over of property from one charity to another.—A contingent limitation over of property from one charity to another is not within the principles of the rule against perpetuities because a valid perpetuity is created by the first gift and so the gift over on an event beyond the limit of perpetuities cannot tend to make the property more inalienable. That is to say, a gift to a charity for charitable purposes with a gift over on an event which may be beyond ordinary limits of perpetuities by another charity is not illegal (o). The exception to the rule of perpetuities in favour of a charitable bequest as laid down in Christ's Hospital v. Grainger (p) not having been embodied in section 114 of the Indian Succession Act, the Calcutta High Court did not apply that decision to this country (q). That case was of a will. There is nothing in the Indian Succession Act corresponding to section 18 of the Transfer of Property Act and it is submitted that a case under this section would be decided on the lines of Christ's Hospital v. Grainger (p).

Cy-pres doctrine.—The preponderance of authority is for the proposition that this doctrine is applicable in wills and not in deeds. Between the applicability of the cy-pres doctrine and the failure of a charitable trust for the non-satisfaction of a condition precedent, the distinction is that in the former there is the breakdown of the machinery required to carry out a validly-created charitable trust and in the

19. Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created in favour of a person without specifying the time when it is to take effect, or in terms specifying that it is to take effect forthwith, or on the happening of an event which must happen, such interest is vested, unless a contrary intention appears from the terms of the transfer.

Vested interest.

A vested interest is not defeated by the death of the transferee before he obtains possession.

Explanation.—An intention that an interest shall not be vested is not to be inferred merely from a provision whereby the enjoyment thereof is postponed, or whereby a prior interest in the same property is given or reserved to some other person, or whereby income arising from the property is directed to be accumulated until the time of enjoyment arrives, or from a provision that if a particular event shall happen, the interest shall pass to another person.

The section.—On a transfer of property—an interest is said to be vested when

- (1) no time is specified as to when it is to take effect, or
- (2) according to the terms thereof it is to take effect immediately, or
- (3) it is to take effect on the happening of an event which must happen.

Possession.—Death of transferee before possession does not divest a vested interest.

Presumption.—There is no presumption against a vested interest by reason of

- (a) the enjoyment having been postponed to a future date, or
- (b) a prior interest is given or reserved to another in the same property, or
- (c) income is to be accumulated till arrival of the date of enjoyment, or
- (d) the interest is to pass to another on the happening of a particular event.

S. 19

Time limit for vesting.—The law is always in favour of construction which vests the estate absolutely and indefeasibly at the earliest moment (u).

According to the section, unless a contrary intention appears from the terms of the transfer, an interest therein vests immediately when created in favour of a person :

- (a) without specifying the time when it is to take effect, or
- (b) in terms specifying that it is to take effect forthwith, or
- (c) on the happening of an event which must happen.

If a bequest is to a person for life and after his death to his children the vesting is not postponed to the death of the life tenant (v).

When in doubt.—In case of doubt the Court leans to that construction which leads to an early vesting (w).

Vest; vested.—An estate or interest may vest either in possession or in interest. When it gives a present right to immediate enjoyment or possession it is said to be vested in possession. It is said to be vested in interest when it gives a present right to future possession or enjoyment.

Illustration.

A trust is made for A for life and after his death to B absolutely. A's estate is vested in possession and B's in interest. If B dies before obtaining possession the estate passes to his representatives. The word "vested" prima facie means vested in interest, but by force of a context it may have a different meaning such as "vested in possession" or "indefeasibly vested" (x). It means "come into possession" and not "accrue in point of interest" (y).

Words.—Words of futurity when introduced in a deed of transfer raise the question whether the enjoyment and possession of the estate are deferred or merely the vesting is postponed.

The words "to hold for the use and benefit of" the son or sons strongly support an immediate vesting of the interest. The words "to be made over" are more consistent with the postponement of the vesting in possession of that which is vested in interest, than with the postponement of the vesting in interest itself as is implied by such words as "to be transferred" (z). As to the words "on his attaining" and "when" or "if" he shall attain "twenty-three" or "at twenty-three" there is no difference. All equally import contingency when they are contained in the gift itself and are uncontrolled by other portions of the deed (a). The expression "after his death" is taken to indicate merely the time when the gift over becomes reduced to possession and not the time when the right to such possession vests. But if the bequest is to such children as may survive the testator or be living at his death, then the condition of surviving or being alive on his death would be a condition precedent to the vesting and no child that does not survive will acquire a vested interest (b). In considering the vesting of estate under a bequest the Judicial Committee held that the vesting of the estate in the son was not suspended by the direction that the estate should remain in the hands of the executor, who should "make over the share" of each on his attaining twenty-one years; those words merely pointed to the possession and enjoyment of the shares, which had already been vested (c).

Statutory vesting.—The word 'vest' is used specially to denote a transfer under a statute. Notable instances are—under the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, III of 1909 (d), on a person being adjudicated insolvent his property vests in the Official Assignee—so also under various provisions of Trustees Act, XXVII of 1866, the Trustees and Mortgagees Powers Act, XXVIII of 1866, the Indian Succession Act, 1925 (e), the Code of Civil Procedure in case of trustees of public charities (f) and sale of moveable property by the Court (g).

Limitation Act, 1908.—The words "vested in trust" are used in section 10 of the Indian Limitation Act. It has been held while transfer of proprietary rights is not intended, mere transference of management or control is not enough to satisfy the requirements of "vesting" as contemplated by this section: a right to call for a transfer and to possess the property for the purpose of the trust and also the power to dispose of it according to the terms of the trust without reference to the owner are the essentials that constitute the "vesting" (h).

Indian Succession Act, 1925.—Section 119 is the vesting section as to wills. There are a number of illustrations to this section, but it is doubtful how far, if at all, it is permissible to refer to illustrations in one statute for the purpose of construing another in similar terms.

Contrary intention.—The explanation to the section illustrates what is not a contrary intention. There is no definition in the Act of "convey" or of "property" but it is to be noticed that a transfer under section 5 of the Act means a conveyance of property not only in the present but also in future (i). The explanation to the section gives examples of vested interests which import a contingency.

Transferee's representatives.—On death of a transferee whose interest in property has vested, his representatives are entitled to the same. This is exemplified by illustration (i) to section 119 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. And according to the present section a vested interest is not defeated by the death of the transferee before he obtains possession.

Enjoyment of interest postponed.—The explanation to the section deals with certain rules of presumption, one of them being that an inference should not be drawn against the vesting of interest by reason of a provision in the instrument whereby the enjoyment of the interest is deferred. A similar provision is added in the explanation to section 119 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, which is explained by illustration (ii) as follows:—

A bequeaths to B Rs. 100 to be paid to him upon his attaining the age of 18 years. Upon A's death the legacy becomes vested in B.

A testator died in 1896 bequeathing his property, with the exception of an annuity to his wife and some other specific legacies, to his only son who had attained his majority at the date of his father's death, subject to restriction that he should not be allowed to enjoy it until the end of the year 1900. The Court held that the

- S. 19 son took an immediate vested interest in the estate of the testator and the condition restricting his immediate enjoyment was repugnant and thus invalid (j). Reference was made to Hanson v. Graham (k) in which case the subject of immediate gifts postponing enjoyment and gifts postponed to or contingent on the donee attaining a certain age has been discussed.

The rule under which the Courts will set aside or disregard conditions or restrictions as repugnant to a previous gift is well recognized in England and is thus stated by Lindley, L.J., in the case of Harbin v. Masterman (l). Now notwithstanding the general principle that a donee or legatee can only take what is given him on the terms on which it is given yet by our law there is a remarkable exception to this general principle. Conditions which are repugnant to the estate to which they are annexed are absolutely void and may consequently be disregarded. This doctrine underlies the rule laid down in Saunders v. Vautier (m) and enunciated with great clearness by Vice-Chancellor Wood in Gosling v. Gosling (n) and in Weatherall v. Thornbough (o) by Lord Justice James. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Harris v. Brown (p) held that the vesting was not suspended by the direction that the estate should remain with the executor who should "make over the share" of each of the sons on his attaining twenty-one years, and that these words merely pointed to the possession and enjoyment of the shares which had already vested. It must be remembered that it is within a comparatively recent period that Indian settlers and testators have adopted English modes of creating interests in their estates. The only safe course is to give to the words their plain ordinary meaning. The postponement of an adopted son's estate during the widow's life by agreement does not make the son's interest contingent, but he has a vested interest which he is entitled to deal with during the life of the adoptive mother (q). A settlor after making provision for his widow for life directed the trustee to hold the rest of the trust estate . . . for the use and benefit of the son or sons of the settlor "to be made over" to such son or sons on the attainment by him or them of the age of twenty-one years. It was held that the gift to the sons vested on the death of the tenant for life subject to a possibility of being divested in the case of sons who should fail to attain the age of twenty-one, and therefore, the gift was good (r).

A Portuguese inhabitant of Bombay by his will of 1866 devised his estate in trust to pay the dividends for the maintenance and education of his children until each of his sons should attain the age of twenty-one when his or their share was to be paid unto him or them. He further directed that whatever might remain of the moneys collected by the executors after all the sons had attained twenty-one and the daughters had married, should be distributed in equal parts between the sons and daughters that might be surviving at the time and in case any of his children should happen to die under twenty-one his or her share should be given to the survivors or survivor of them. It was held that the sons took a vested interest on attaining the age of twenty-one and that the provision which related to distribution did not divest the shares so vested (s).

A prior interest in the same property is given or reserved to some other person.—

fact that a prior interest precedes. This is illustrated by illustration (iii) of section 119 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925.

A fund is bequeathed to A for life and after his death to B. On the testator's death the legacy to B becomes vested in interest in B.

A Hindu testator after giving his wife and his mother possession of his properties, directed that on their death the sons of his sisters should hold the properties in possession and enjoyment. It was held by the Privy Council that the sons of the testator's sisters took a vested interest in their respective shares at the testator's death though their possession and enjoyment were postponed until the deaths of the mother and widow (t). The fact that the estate was subject to partial trusts or charges did not delay vesting (u).

Direction to accumulate the income until time of enjoyment.—A gift of the interim income does not lead to the inference that there was an intention to delay the vesting. Where a legacy is directed to be paid at a particular age and the whole income is given in the meantime, that gives a present vested interest (v). There is not only a gift of the intermediate interest indicative of an intention to make an immediate gift, because, for the purpose of the interest, there must be an immediate separation of the legacy from the bulk of the estate; but a positive direction to separate legacy from the estate, and to hold it upon trust for the legatee when he shall attain twenty-five (w). The practice of the English Courts in disregarding direction for postponement of the enjoyment after coming of age of the devisee is followed in this country, and consequently, where a testator by his will directed that out of the net income of the estate he should spend Rs. 500 every year for maintenance of each of his two disciples and when one of them, J., should attain the age of 30 years should give to him the net residue of his property or in case of his decease to the other disciple S., it was held that the income of the property including all income accrued since majority must be paid to J., the Official Trustee retaining the corpus until J. should attain the age of thirty years (x).

This is so under section 119 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, as per illustration (v). A bequeaths the whole of his property to B upon trust to pay certain debts out of the income and then to make over the fund to C. At A's death the gift to C becomes vested in interest in him.

Gift of interim maintenance.—Maintenance is not equivalent to "interest" for the purpose of vesting a legacy (y).

Vested subject to being divested.—These words mean that the estate when vested is defeasible on the happening of a particular event. Divesting clauses receive a strict construction, as the law does not favour divesting. The condition for divesting and the intention to divest should be clearly made out (z). The fourth rule in the explanation that where there is a provision that on the happening of a particular event, the interest shall pass to another person, does not import a

S. 19 postponement of vesting. Similar provision is made in explanation to section 119 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, of which illustration (vi) affords an example. A testator gave his residuary estate to trustees upon trust to invest and divide the same among the children of his brothers A and B, the share of each son to be paid on his attaining the age of twenty-one and the share of the daughter on attaining that age or previously marrying with benefit of survivorship between and among all the said sons and daughters. The testator left surviving his two brothers and a sister C. A and B both died before the eldest of the testator's nephews or nieces attained twenty-one or married. In a suit by the widow and executrix of A for a declaration that the bequests were void, it was held that the legatees took vested interests, subject to being divested on death before the contingencies in the will happened, and that the period of distribution alone was postponed and the bequests were valid (a). A bequest to A for life and afterwards to B but if he should be then dead to C and D in equal shares or the whole to survivor of them. B died in the lifetime of the tenant for life as did also C and D. Held the gift to C and D was a vested interest in them as tenants in common subject to be divested if one only should survive the tenant for life (b). And where in a compromise of a suit between two brothers for possession of immoveable property it was provided that certain property should be held by one brother for his life and afterwards should go to the second brother if he survives the first the second brother was held to have taken a vested interest (c). So where a settlor made a trust for himself and his family and after his death, directed the trustee, after making provision for a monthly payment of Rs. 30 to the widow for life, to hold the rest of the trust estate "for the use and benefit of the son or sons" of the settlor, "to be made over" to such son or sons on the attainment by him or them of the age of twenty-one years, it was held the gift to the sons vested on the death of the tenant for life, subject to a possibility of being divested in the case of sons who should fail to attain the age of twenty-one and, therefore, the gift was good (d).

Mahomedan Law.—The application of this section to Mahomedans is excepted (e). Gifts of future and limited estates resembling what we call vested remainders (f) are not recognized by the Sunni Mahomedan Law, but they are so recognized by the Shiah Law (g). The latter point is not, however, free from doubt (h). A mere spes successionis is unknown and not recognized (i).

Life estate and vested remainder.—Certain lands were conveyed to a trustee in trust for A during his life and on his death to convey the lands to R provided that the trustee should at any time convey the lands to R if A should so desire. Held that the right of R was a vested interest (j). On a partition between a Hindu father and his three sons the father was given a life estate in certain lands and on his death the same to be divided between his three sons in certain proportions; held the interest of the sons was a vested remainder in the land (k). Under Hanafi Law a life estate is not recognized, nor can it be created. A Sunni Mahomedan female made a will in favour of her daughter whereby she was to enjoy the property during her life but was forbidden to alienate it by way of sale, mortgage, gift, etc. She further directed that on the death of the daughter her step-son and his descendants should take the property as absolute owners. The step-son having died during the lifetime of the daughter, it was held by Beaumont, C. J., that under the will the daughter did not take an absolute interest but a life-interest with remainder to the step-son but the remainder failed to take effect as he did not survive the daughter. Held by Rangnekar, J., that the grant of a life-estate to the daughter operated under Mahomedan Law as a grant of an absolute estate. Mahomedan Law does not recognize a vested remainder (l).

Where performance of an act is not a condition precedent ; the transferee takes a vested interest.—A certain person made a disposition of his property in favour of his wife by means of a will which provided that the son should get the property after performing the obsequies of the mother in whose favour the disposition was made. No provision was made in the will for the enjoyment of the property in case the son should die before performing the obsequies. Held, the condition of performing the obsequies was not a condition precedent and the son got a vested interest in the property (m).

Interest dependent on the death of present holder.—Where in a compromise suit between two brothers for possession of immoveable property it was provided that certain property should be held by one brother for his life and afterwards should go to the second brother if he survived the first, it was held that the second brother took a vested and not a contingent interest in the property so settled (n).

Transferable and attachable.—A vested interest is transferable (o) and is therefore susceptible of being attached and sold in execution of a decree (p).

Postponement of adopted son's estate during the widow's life.—An agreement depriving the adopted son of his right to take possession of the property of an adoptive father is not prohibited by law. Where such an agreement gives a life estate to the adoptive mother and the remainder to the adopted son, the latter's interest is not that of a contingent collateral Hindu reversioner, but that he has a vested interest which he is competent to deal with subject to the life estate of the mother. He is not barred by the provisions of section 6 (a) of the Transfer of Property Act of 1882 from dealing with the property (q).

Beneficiary's right to transfer of possession.—Under section 56 of the Indian Trust Act, II of 1882, where there is only one beneficiary and he is competent to contract, or where there are several beneficiaries and they are competent to contract and all of one mind, he or they may require the trustee to transfer the trust property to him or them, or to such person as he or they may direct.

to him. A on attaining majority may, as the person exclusively interested in the trust property, require the trustees to transfer it immediately to him.

(c) A transfers certain property to B and directs him to sell or invest it for the benefit of C who is competent to contract. C may elect to take the property in its original character.

Right of inheritance.—The right of a son or daughter or other heir of a person to inherit his property is not an estate in remainder or in reversion in immoveable property or an estate otherwise deferred in enjoyment. It is neither a vested nor a contingent right. It does not come within the definition of a “vested interest” in section 19 of the Transfer of Property Act, IV of 1882, or of “a contingent interest” in section 21 of the Act and section 119 of the Indian Succession Act. So far from being a vested or a contingent right, or a right in present or in future, it is, in the language of clause (a) of section 6 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), “the chance of an heir-apparent succeeding to an estate” or “a mere possibility” of succession which cannot be transferred.

A mere spes successionis is unknown to, and not recognized by, Mahomedan Law (r).

Vested or contingent interest for what purpose treated alike.—In New's case (s) it was held that where there arises an emergency or a state of circumstances which, it may reasonably be supposed, was not foreseen or anticipated by the author of the trust and is unprovided for by the trust instrument, and which renders it desirable and perhaps even essential, in the interests of the beneficiaries, that certain acts should be done by the trustees which they themselves have no power to do, and to which the consent of all the beneficiaries cannot be obtained by reason of some not being sui juris or not yet in existence, the Court will exercise its general administrative jurisdiction by sanctioning on behalf of all parties interested, those acts being done by the trustees. This case constitutes the high-water mark of the exercise by the Court of its extraordinary jurisdiction in relation to trusts. It shows how far the Court will go and beyond what point it will not go. When an advance under the above-mentioned circumstances was sought out of the estate for the benefit of a minor who was a beneficiary with a vested or contingent interest, the Court exercised its extraordinary jurisdiction and granted a reasonable amount (t).

Onus.—The burden of showing that in a transfer of property there is no vesting of interest, is on those who assert it (u). And the weight of the burden is aggravated by the elimination, in the explanation, of circumstances, which might, apart from the explanation, be thought sufficient to discharge it.

Limitation expressed in form contingent construed as vested.—A leading authority for this construction is Boraston's case (v). Lands were devised for eight years and afterwards to remain with the executors till such time as H. should accomplish the age of twenty-one and thereupon to him and his heirs and assigns for ever. H. died before attaining twenty-one. It was contended that the remainder had not vested in him but the Court held otherwise, observing that the adverbs "when" and "then" only denoted the time when the remainder was to take effect in possession and not when it was to vest. The authorities on the subject were summed up in Maddison v. Chapman (w), in which it was laid down that a vested interest previously given is incapable of destruction except upon the clearest terms to that effect, contained in the limitation over and where a limitation over which though expressed in the form of a contingent limitation is in fact merely dependent upon a condition essential to the determination of the interest previously limited, the Court is at liberty to hold that notwithstanding the words in form import contingency, they mean no more in fact than that the person to take under the limitation over is to take subject to the interest so previously limited. The true test is, Can the words which in form import contingency be read as equivalent to "subject to the interest previously limited?"

Ss. 19-

20. Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created for the benefit of a person not then living, he acquires upon his birth, unless a contrary intention appears from the terms of the transfer, a vested interest, although he may not be entitled to the enjoyment thereof immediately on his birth.

When unborn person acquires vested interest on transfer for his benefit.

Interest acquired by an unborn person.—On a transfer made for the benefit of a person not born, he takes a vested interest although the enjoyment may be deferred beyond his birth. Thus where a settlement is made in trust for A for life and on his death in trust for his child B for life and on the death of B in trust to the children of B absolutely, although the children of B are not entitled to the property till the death of B, they take a vested interest in the property on birth. But a trust for the benefit of an unborn person must not infringe the rule in section 13.

Contrary intention.—An interest may be vested or contingent; when the intention is against a vested interest it must be a contingent interest.

Sections 19 and 20.—The former section deals with vested interests in favour of living persons, the latter with unborn persons.

Particular estate and deferred estate.—In transfers referred to in sections 19 and 20 there are necessarily two estates, the particular estate and the deferred estate. The prior estate is known as the particular estate and the subsequent estate as the deferred estate.

21. Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created in favour of a person to take effect only on the happening of a specified uncertain event, or if a specified uncertain event shall not happen, such person thereby acquires a contingent interest in the property. Such interest becomes a vested interest, in the former case, on the happening of Contingent interest.

S. 21 the event, in the latter, when the happening of the event becomes impossible.

Exception.—Where, under a transfer of property, a person becomes entitled to an interest therein upon attaining a particular age, and the transferor also gives to him absolutely the income to arise from such interest before he reaches that age, or directs the income or so much thereof as may be necessary to be applied for his benefit, such interest is not contingent.

What is a contingent interest.—On a transfer of property an interest is said to be contingent when it is to take effect only if a specified uncertain event

(a) shall happen or

(b) shall not happen.

Every contingent interest must become vested at one time or other, in case (a) on the happening of the event, in case (b) when the happening of the event becomes impossible.

Devises and bequests contingent.—These are dealt with in section 120 of the Indian Succession Act which contains numerous illustrations of which (i) to (iii) and (v) to (ix) are examples of bequests and devises to take effect in case a specified uncertain event shall happen, while illustrations (x) and (xi) are examples of bequests and devises in case a specified uncertain event shall not happen. Illustrations (xii) and (xiii) exemplify the exception to that section. This section of the Indian Succession Act is parallel to section 21 of the Transfer of Property Act, but the two sections are in conflict with one another in the case of a gift over by reason of section 12 of the Transfer of Property Act, of which there is no parallel section in the Indian Succession Act, so that a condition like the one referred to in illustration (vii) to section 120 of the Indian Succession Act would be void in the case of a transfer inter vivos under section 12 of the Transfer of Property Act. A Bengali Hindu by his will authorized his widow to adopt a son, one after another, five in succession. He further directed that if his wife died without adopting or the adopted boy pre-deceased her without leaving male issue his estate on the death of his wife should pass to the sons of his sister who might be living at the time of his death. There were two sons of his sister living at his death. The widow adopted a boy who died childless and unmarried. She then died after him. It was held that there was a valid contingent bequest in favour of the testator's nephews (x).

Where the terms of a bequest were "if both my daughters have issue they shall divide the properties equally, those who have no issue shall enjoy the income for their lives and those who have issue shall enjoy the whole property," it was held that birth of issue was a contingency on which the gift in each case was absolute (y).

Providing for his daughters, a Hindu testator directed "when they will be married" separate houses should be provided for them. The direction was coupled with a gift for maintenance to each of Rs. 600 a year and that "as long as the daughters will live in the separate houses they would get the fixed allowances and if they do not live in this place they would get Rs. 10." The daughters were married and lived in separate houses. Held that the payment of maintenance was not contingent on the daughter's marriage or any other future event (z).

A Hindu died in 1875 leaving a widow, I., and a son's daughter, B. By his will he authorized his widow to adopt, prohibiting her from doing so if B. had a son. He further provided if I. died without adopting B., her sons were owners of the property. B. gave birth to a son in 1891. In 1896 I. adopted. B. died in 1897 and I. three weeks later. In a suit by B.'s son for possession of the property it was held that there was no direct gift of the remainder to B. but a gift contingent on the happening of an uncertain event, viz., the dying of I. without having taken a boy in adoption. The contingency could not be regarded as having occurred in view of the fact that I. did not adopt (a).

Person entitled to interest upon attaining a particular age.—The exception to the section deals with the case where under a transfer a person becomes entitled to the interest therein upon attaining a particular age. These words, though apparently importing a contingency (b), do not prevent the vesting of the estate and the transferee is deemed to have taken a vested interest where the income of the property is given to him absolutely till he reaches that particular age or where there is a direction in the transfer that the income or so much thereof as may be necessary shall be applied for his benefit until he reaches that age. Section 120 of the Indian Succession Act contains a similar provision. But section 172 of that Act enacts that where a bequest of the interest of a fund is made to a person without affording any indication of an intention that the enjoyment of the bequest should be of limited duration, the principal as well as the interest belongs to the legatee.

In a Bombay case a Parsi by his will directed his executor to maintain himself and the testator's son and to defray the expenses of educating the son out of the testator's "property and effects" and to make over the "remaining properties" to the son upon reaching his majority. The son died an infant. It was attempted to bring the case within the exception to section 120 of the Indian Succession Act, but the Privy Council held that the case did not fall within the exception and the bequest of the residue to the son was contingent on his attaining the age of majority (c). A devise of real estate to a devisee when he shall attain a certain age, or if he shall attain a certain age, without any further context to assist, is contingent, and the attainment of the prescribed age is a condition precedent to the estate vesting in him (d).

The context may enable the Court to declare the estate to be a vested estate defeasible on death under the prescribed age: for instance, there may be in terms a disposition of the intermediate income, or a gift over in the event of the devisee failing to attain the necessary age or some other sufficient context. The rule, however, is that if possible, you hold a condition to be subsequent rather than precedent (e). It has been much contested whether this rule in Edwards v. Hammond (f) can be applied where attainment of the given age is made part of

S. 21 the description of the devisee ; and that when it is a part of the description until there is a person who answers that description there can be no vesting of the property in question, for there cannot be a vesting in an unascertained person. The proper way of dealing with a question of this sort is to see if the authorities prevent one from giving the words the natural construction which they would otherwise have. There are certain cases, of which Phipps v. Ackers (g) is an example, in which a gift to a named person if and when he attains the age of twenty-one years, with a gift over in the event of his dying under the age, was held to confer upon the original devisee a vested estate liable to be divested. The origin of that rule is not in doubt. It was derived from the anxiety of the Court to prevent the failure of a contingent devise taking effect in the future, for default of an estate of freehold sufficient to support it. Of the other class of authorities, the leading case of Duffield v. Duffield (h) is the best example. That was the case of a gift to a person not definitely described by name or description but to a person who may or may not fulfil a particular description and a devise to him if he does fulfil that description, with an alternative devise, or even a devise over, if there should be no such person. In those cases it has been held that the gift is contingent. It is an established principle of law that estates must remain contingent until there be a person having all the qualifications that the testator requires and completely answering the description given of the object of his bounty in his will. A testator by his will dated 1917 devised and bequeathed his properties "upon trust in fee simple or absolutely for such son of my son W. A. as first or alone attains the age of twenty-one years or failing any such son, then upon trust as part of my residuary estate." He gave the residue of his estate in trust for both or either of his sons W. A. and J. J. A. who should survive him, and if both, in equal shares. It also provided that if and so long as some son of his son W. A. should be living, the property should not become absolutely vested beneficially in any such son but the trustee should out of the residuary estate maintain and keep up the establishment and allow the same to be used by any of the persons for the time being entitled in expectancy thereto. The testator died in 1919 and his two sons survived. W. A. had four sons living at the testator's death, the eldest son being thirteen years of age. Held that the interests of the grandsons were contingent, and until one of them attained the age of twenty-one or all of them died without attaining that age, W. A. and J. J. A. were entitled to the intermediate rents and profits of the property (i).

Where a testatrix directed that certain moneys should be held upon trust to pay the dividends unto her daughter for life and after her death in trust for the lawful children of the said daughter who being sons or a son shall attain the age of twenty-one years or being daughters or a daughter shall attain that age or marry and if more than one in equal shares, it was held that attaining of twenty-one years was a condition precedent and that no child who did not attain twenty-one years could take (j).

A single Judge of the Calcutta High Court, dealing with a will prior to the Succession Act and, therefore, construing it according to the rules of the English Law, held that "where the words of contingency form part of the description of the class of persons to take, where, as in this case, the gift is to those "who shall attain the age of twenty-one" the words must receive their natural construction, and no estate vests in any one till he attains the prescribed age. cases, Festing v. Allen (k) and Bull v. Pritchard (l) are leading cases. It is true that in Browne v. Browne (m) Stuart, V. C., refused to follow Festing v. Allen (k) and in *Jull v. C., expresses disapproval of the same case: "I think it clear, however, upon all the authorities, that in such cases there must, at any rate, be something in the context pointing to a different construction, or something in the will inconsistent with the literal construction, to justify a Court in adopting any but the literal construction" (o).

Remainders.—These are of two kinds, vested and contingent. The former is one which is always ready to come into enjoyment or possession the moment the prior estate determines. In case of a vested remainder the gift is complete, only the enjoyment is deferred till the particular or prior estate determines. A contingent remainder is a future estate. In a contingent remainder the estate depends upon the determination of the prior estate but, unlike a vested remainder, it is not ready to come into possession the moment the particular estate determines. A vested remainder is alienable. A contingent remainder is not. Every contingent remainder of an estate of freehold must have a particular estate of freehold to support it (p). In a vested remainder the estate which follows the preceding estate is certain. In a contingent remainder it is uncertain or conditional. A. by her will devised that the yearly income of her settled estate should be equally divided between her daughters L. and M. and that in the event of the death of either the survivor should receive the whole income. It was held that gift to the survivor was a contingent and not a vested estate, for it was uncertain which of the two would be the survivor (q).

Mahomedan Law.—A vested remainder is not recognized by Mahomedan Law (s).

Discretionary trust to apply intermediate income in maintenance.—A testatrix devised her estate to trustees upon trust to convey and transfer the same to U. "when and so soon as he shall attain the age of twenty-five years." She then directed her trustees to apply "the whole or such part as they in their absolute discretion think fit" of the income for the "maintenance, education or benefit" of the person "presumptively entitled" to her residuary estate and "during the suspense of absolute vesting" to accumulate the surplus income (if any) in augmentation of her residuary estate with power to resort to accumulations as income in any subsequent year for the purpose aforesaid. Held, following Fox v. Fox (t) and In re Williams (u), that U. took a vested interest at the testatrix's death and on attaining twenty-one was entitled to an immediate conveyance and transfer (v).

A discretionary power to the trustees "to spend such sum or sums out of the income for the maintenance, education, etc. of such son or sons as trustee or trustees shall think fit" does not bring a contingent gift within the exception (w).

Gifts to a class.—These would be governed by the same rules as are prescribed in the section for an individual.

22. Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created in favour of such members only of a class as shall attain a particular age, such interest does not vest in any member of the class who has not attained that age.

Transfer to members of a class who attain a particular age.

Class gifts.—In construing gifts to a class due attention must be paid to two well-known canons of construction:—(1) That “where there is a gift to a class any members of which may have to be ascertained beyond the limits of perpetuity for instance, to the children of a living person who shall attain twenty-five the whole gift is void.” (2) That “where there is no direction as to vesting, it is important to distinguish a gift to a contingent class and a gift to a class upon a contingency; thus, a gift to children who attain twenty-one, or to such children as attain twenty-one, is a gift to a contingent class, and will only vest in those who attain twenty-one, though there may be a gift of interest or other circumstances, which in a gift to a class upon a contingency, as, for instance, at twenty-one, might have the effect of vesting the bequest”(x).

It is well settled that if there be a gift to an individual or a class upon the attainment of a certain age, such gift is prima facie contingent on the specified age being attained, but that where there is also a gift to the same individual or class of the income to accrue before the specified age be attained, the gift of the corpus, though in form contingent, will be construed as conferring a vested interest. Further, there is a broad distinction between a gift to a class upon attaining a specified age and a gift to such member of a class as attain a specified age. In the latter case clearly no one is intended to take unless he attains the age in question. It is no longer a question of construing as vested a gift which is only prima facie contingent, but of adding to the class of beneficiaries. It is with the latter class of cases that the present section deals, while the former class is the subject of section 21 of the Act.

Such members only of a class as shall attain a particular age.—Under a gift to a class contingently on their attaining twenty-one, the eldest of the class on attaining twenty-one takes a vested interest in possession of his share and a contingent interest in the share of other members of the class who have not attained the age of twenty-one (y). But where “the gift is to a class on the youngest attaining twenty-one, all who attain twenty-one will take vested interests whether they survive the time of distribution or not. But a member of the class dying under twenty-one takes nothing”(z).

Gift “prima facie” contingent controlled by other provisions.—Where a bequest to children of a tenant for life was followed by gift over of the share if such tenant died without issue, a provision that any beneficiary being entitled to a vested interest in any capital moneys under the will should until attaining twenty-five years be only entitled to the net income to arise from his "expectant share or interest" was construed as entitling each of the children to a vested interest before attaining the age of twenty-five years, the words "expectant share or interest" being construed as having reference to the vested share of a child liable to be divested upon death under twenty-five years of age (a).

The rules of construction deducible from the authorities are :

- (1) Where there is a clear gift to an individual an additional direction to pay does not delay the vesting.
- (2) The same rule applies where there is gift to a class and the distribution is postponed for the convenience of the estate or of division till the members attain a certain age or till the youngest attains twenty-one (b).
- (3) If the gift to the individual is in terms apparently made contingent upon his attaining majority, or a certain age, the giving of the interest in the meantime will have the effect of vesting (c).
- (4) The same rule does not apply where there is a gift of an entire fund payable to a class of persons equally upon their attaining a certain age. There a direction to apply the income of the whole fund, in the meantime, for their maintenance, does not create a vested interest in the member of the class who does not attain that age (d). Where the only gift to a class is contained in the direction to distribute, those alone, who answer to the description of the persons amongst whom the distribution is to be made at the time of distribution, are entitled to share (e).

These rules of construction must give way where the words exclude their application.

Bequests and devises.—These are governed by section 121 of the Indian Succession Act which corresponds with section 22 of the Transfer of Property Act. The illustration to the section renders it clear that in the case of a gift to such members of a class as attain a specified age the payment of the income of the share to him for his maintenance and education does not vest the gift in such member of a class as has not attained the specified age.

23. S. 23 of a contingent remainder the first and principal is that the seisin or feudal possession must never be without an owner and this rule is sometimes expressed as follows:—That every contingent remainder of an estate of freehold must have a particular estate of freehold to support it.” Accordingly a transfer to A for life and after his decease and one day to B, is void, for the moment that A’s estate is determined by death, the possession is not to belong to B till one day afterwards. The consequence is that the gift of the future estate intended to be made to B is absolutely void, as for one day the possession is without an owner. “As a corollary to the rule above laid down, arises another proposition, frequently itself laid down as a distinct rule, viz., that every contingent remainder must vest or become an actual estate during the continuance of a particular estate which supports it or eo instanti that such particular estate determines” (f).

Contingent bequest.—These are dealt with under sections 124 and 125 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, of which the former section corresponds with section 23 of the Transfer of Property Act. Under the former section it is necessary that the event should happen “before the period when the fund is bequeathed is payable or distributable.” While under the Transfer of Property Act such event must happen “before or at the same time as the intermediate or preceding interest ceases to exist.” A testamentary disposition by a Hindu of his residuary estate to his grandson who may be born within ten years after his death was held invalid, for until then the estate would not vest in any person (g). A Hindu testator left three sons, the eldest of full age and the other two minors. He directed, “my three sons are entitled to enjoy all the moveable and immoveable properties left by me equally. Any one of the sons being sonless, the surviving sons shall be entitled to all the properties equally.” It was held that these words gave a legacy to the survivors contingently on the happening of a specified uncertain event which had not happened before the property bequeathed was distributable, the period of distribution being the time of the testator’s death (h). A Hindu by his will provided that his daughters’ and brother’s daughters should be maliks and come in possession in equal shares of the property. In the event of his daughter or brother dying childless, “the shares shall devolve in equal shares on the surviving daughters.” It was held that the expression maliks ordinarily implied an absolute gift and that the provision of survivorship applied only to the case of a daughter dying during the lifetime of the testator and did not take effect in the present case, the daughter whose share was in question having died several years after the testator (i). A Parsi testator bequeathed certain legacies to his son N. and directed that in the event of his dying after the death of the testator, without marrying or if married without an heir, his share should revert to the surviving sisters or their heirs. The testator died and N. claimed the legacies absolutely. Upholding his contention, it was observed that no time was fixed for the happening of the event and the mere fact that the testator contemplated that in the ordinary course of nature his son would survive him and die after him would not justify the Court in concluding that the testator had fixed the time for the occurrence of that event (j).

Acceleration of remainder on failure of life estate.—A gift in remainder expectant on the termination of an estate for life, does not fail, but is accelerated by reason of the gift of such prior life estate not taking effect (k).

24. Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is to accrue to such of certain persons as shall be surviving at some period, but the exact period is not specified. the interest shall go to such of them as shall be alive when the intermediate or precedent interest ceases to exist, unless a contrary intention appears from the terms of the transfer.

Transfer to such of certain persons as survive at some period not specified.

Illustration.

A transfers property to B for life, and after his death to C and D, equally to be divided between them, or to the survivor of them. C dies during the life of B. D survives B. At B's death the property passes to D.

General rule.—Words of survivorship are to be referred to the period of division or enjoyment unless there be an intention to the contrary (m). English authorities shew that the same principles apply in construing a deed as in construing a will (n). In construing survivorship clauses, the difficulty is to ascertain the time at which the survivors are to be determined. In case of a gift following a life-interest, the survivors are determined on the death of the tenant for life. If there be several tenancies for life, the time to determine is when the last tenant for life dies. The absence of a gift over of the entire fund on the failure of issue of all the tenants for life, is not of itself conclusive to shew that the words "survivors or survivor" are to be read in their strict literal sense (o). There are, however, cases (p) which attribute to the words "survivors or survivor" the meaning "others or other." The Courts are reluctant to go so far (q) though with the assistance of an ultimate gift over, they have frequently done so.

Time of division.—The section lays down the rule of construction of gifts to survivors who outlive the happening of a particular event or the death of a particular person.

Gift over to survivor.—The general rule as laid down in Cripps v. Wolcott (r) is that where there is a gift to A for life with remainder to A, B and C and to the survivors or survivor, the survivorship is ascertained at the death of the tenant for life. In White v. Baker (s), Turner, L. J., says: "Where there is a bequest to A for life and after his death to B and C or the survivor of them, some meaning must of course be attached to the words "the survivor." They may refer to any one of three events—to one of the persons named surviving the other, to one of them only surviving the testator, or to one of them only surviving the tenant for life, and in the absence of any indication to the contrary they are taken to refer to the latter event, as being the more probable one to have been referred to." The above rule and passage were referred to by Cozens-Hardy, M. R., in In re Poultney, Poultney

Ss. 24-25 v. Poultney (t), where the testator devised his estate to his wife for life and from and after her death equally between his eight children named in the will. The last clause in the will provided, "I direct that in case of the death of one or more of my children that their equal share or shares are to be equally divided between the survivors." The eight named children survived the testator, but one of them died in the widow's lifetime, leaving children. Held only those children who survived the widow were entitled to share in the testator's estate.

Wills.—In case of testamentary disposition the law is as prescribed in section 125 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. Of the four illustrations to that section, in (i) the time of payment is the death of the testator when the will comes into operation, in (ii) on the termination of the life estate. Illustration (ii) is similar to the illustration to section 24 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882. The rule of construction in the section does not apply to illustrations (iii) and (iv).

Unless a contrary intention appears.—The rule in the section does not apply where an intention to the contrary is expressed. That is, the survivorship has no reference to the time of division but to some other period.

Exception to rule.—Under an express gift over after an interest for life by words importing a joint interest, the survivorship is to be referred to the period of distribution. Where a bequest is to A for life and after his death to B and C and in case either of them dies in the lifetime of A, the whole to the survivor, it is plain that the words in their natural import refer to the one surviving the other (u).

Presumption of survivorship.—There is no presumption as to survivorship. The presumption under section 108 of the Evidence Act that a man not heard of for some years is dead, is at the time when the question is raised and not at some antecedent date (v). A similar view was expressed by the Burma Chief Court (w) and accepted by the Privy Council.

25. An interest created on a transfer of property and dependent upon a condition fails if the fulfilment of the condition is impossible, or is forbidden by law, or is of such a nature that, if permitted, it would defeat the provisions of any law, or is fraudulent, or involves or implies injury to the person or property of another, or the Court regards it as immoral or opposed to public policy.

Condition.—The word “condition” is not defined in the Act. Being a term in the contract, it is the essence of it. Conditions have been classified in a variety of ways but we are concerned with conditions precedent and conditions subsequent. This and the following sections relate to conditions. In the case of a condition precedent the performance of the condition is essential for the transfer to operate (x). Till then there is no vesting, the transfer is suspensory. It is a description of the event on which the transferee is to take. A condition subsequent is one on the non-performance of which an estate vested is divested (y). Section 25 treats of conditions precedent and section 29 of conditions subsequent. In the former case the non-performance of the condition causes the transfer to fail. In the latter case the non-performance divests the estate which passes to another. In the former case substantial compliance is enough, according to section 26, while in the latter case strict compliance is necessary, according to section 29.

If a condition attached to a devise is capable of being construed either as a condition precedent or as a condition subsequent the Court will prefer the latter construction (z). A similar construction would apply to a deed.

Continuing conditions.—These belong to the group of conditions subsequent. A condition requiring a transferee to reside in a particular house belongs to this class. A testatrix made a charitable bequest and amongst other conditions made an “abiding condition” that the black gown should be worn in the pulpit. It was held that the condition was subsidiary to the main charitable object and as the performance had been shewn to be impracticable, the condition might be dispensed with (a).

Time for performance.—The section is silent as to the time within which the condition must be performed. It is submitted that it must be performed within a reasonable time before it can be imputed to the transferee that he had failed to perform (b).

When the period is prescribed the Court may enlarge the time and in all cases that lie in compensation it may dispense with the time even in the case of a condition precedent (c). A testator gave a legacy to A in the event of B dying unmarried on the express condition that he should, within three years from the testator's death, pay to the executors all moneys due from him to the testator. Held that the condition was substantially performed by payment after the expiration of three years and the legacy was payable (d). So where a testator bequeathed a legacy to his daughter on the express condition that she should settle upon certain trusts of the will a sum to which she was entitled within a year of his death, it was held that the limit of time was not of the essence or substance of the condition and it was sufficiently complied with by the execution of a settlement within the year (e).

There is no general rule in computing time from an act or an event, that the day is to be inclusive or exclusive, depending upon the reason of the thing, according

- S. 25 to the circumstances (f). Under the Indian Succession Act when time is specified, failure to perform within the specified time amounts to non-performance of the condition. According to section 128, illustration (vii), a legacy is bequeathed to A if he executes a certain document within the time specified in the will. The document is executed by A within a reasonable time but not within the time specified in the will. A has not performed the condition and is not entitled to receive the legacy.

Lunacy.—The Court should act for the lunatic to perform a condition as if he were a person of sound mind and guided by reasonable motives (g).

Condition distinguished from election.—Election is treated in section 35 of this Act. The rule of election applies whether the transferor does or does not believe that which he professes to transfer to be his own. Under section 26 a man may in making a transfer of his property impose upon the transferee a condition that he shall dispose of his property in a particular way. In this case the transferor must have known that what he was disposing of was not his own. The main distinction between the two is that in the former case the transfer fails on non-compliance, in the latter case the disappointed transferee is compensated.

Conditional conveyances.—The section deals with interests created on a transfer dependent upon a condition. It enacts that such a transfer shall fail when the condition is such, that if it formed part of the consideration for an agreement, the agreement would be void. Under section 23 and other cognate sections of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, the condition referred to in the section is what is known as a condition precedent, till the fulfilment of which, the operation of the transfer is suspended. A condition must be performed according to the intention of the parties. It must be actually performed, not covinously or in an illusory way.

Presumption.—Where a contract is capable of two constructions, the one making it valid and the other void, it is clear law that the first ought to be adopted (h). The law presumes against illegality. Those who wish to prove illegality must establish it (i). There are two senses in which the word unlawful is commonly used, though somewhat inaccurately. There are some contracts to which the law will not give effect and, therefore, although the parties may enter into what, but for the element which the law condemns, would be perfect contracts, the law would not allow them to operate as contracts, notwithstanding that in point of form the parties have agreed. Some contracts may be void on the ground of immorality, some on the ground that they are contrary to public policy as, for example, in restraint of trade, and contracts so tainted, the law will not lend its aid to enforce. It treats them as if they had not been made at all (j).

Ignorance of condition.—Want of notice of the condition does not relieve the transferee of the consequences, particularly where there is a gift over. It has been held that no duty is cast on an executor to give notice to a legatee of the condition of a legacy (k), but this was doubted in a subsequent case (l).

Impossible condition.—Section 56 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, enacts that an agreement to do an act impossible in itself is void. Hence where the subject-matter of a contract is liable to destruction on a contingency which has already happened, the contract is void (m). A bequest dependent on a condition made impossible of fulfilment by the testator cannot take effect (n). In English Law a distinction prevails when impossibility is brought about by the act or default of the testator, by excusing performance in case of personalty (o), but not in case of realty (p).

Forbidden by law.—These would be acts declared unlawful by statute, criminal or otherwise, such as letting premises to a prostitute for an illegal purpose (q), or to a person for publication of blasphemous lectures (r).

Defeat the provisions of the law.—These would be acts which tend to prevent the course of justice, such as stifling prosecutions and compounding non-compoundable offences. Any contract having a tendency, however slight, to affect the administration of justice, is illegal and void (s), such as securing higher than standard rent (t), the transfer of occupancy rights prohibited by statute (u), a lease of a farm to retail opium without the Collector's permission (v), an agreement in contravention of the Excise Act (w), an assignment by a debtor to defeat the provisions of the Insolvency Law (x), a usufructuary mortgage in contravention of the Tenancy Act, 1901 (y), a bond given by an insolvent after personal discharge to his creditor in consideration of the latter not opposing his final discharge (z), a nominal sale deed and rent note passed by the defendant to his pleader to indemnify the latter against loss which he might suffer under a bail bond (a). The word "any law" in the phrase "would defeat the provisions of any law" has reference to substantive and not to adjectival law (b). Section 24 of the Indian Contract Act is not applicable to transfers of immoveable property, see (c).

Fraudulent.—As to acts or omissions declared fraudulent, see (d).

Involves or implies injury to the person or property of another.—A familiar instance of this is a clog on redemption. A contract to give a son in adoption in consideration of an annual allowance to the natural parents involves an injury to the person and property of the adopted son (e).

Court regards it as immoral.—Contracts not prohibited by positive law nor adjudged illegal by precedent, may nevertheless be void as against principles (f). In English Law a deed executed in consideration of past cohabitation is valid (g).

- S. 25 though not for future cohabitation (h). In India, past cohabitation is not a good consideration for the transfer of property (i). Contracts for letting premises to prostitutes are void (j). No distinction can be made between an illegal and immoral purpose. The rule which is applicable to the matter is ex turpi causa non oritur actio, and whether it is an immoral or illegal purpose in which the plaintiff has participated, it comes equally within the maxim and the effect is the same. No cause of action can arise out of either one or the other (k). Further, there is a distinction between an immoral consideration for a gift and an immoral condition which is subsequently attached to a gift. In the former case the transfer fails altogether, in the latter the gift remains unaffected (l).

Court regards it as opposed to public policy.—Public policy is something which is really part of the common law of the land and does not depend on statute (m). It is a variable thing, fluctuating with the times (n). It is well settled that when it is apparent on the face of the contract that it is unlawful, it is the duty of the Judge himself to take the objection and that too, whether the parties take or waive the objection (o). Any contract or engagement having a tendency, however slight, to affect the administration of justice, is illegal and void. Public policy is that principle of law which holds that no subject can lawfully do that which has a tendency to be injurious to the public or against the public good (p). The following bonds or agreements are opposed to public policy:—to obtain or enforce rights resulting from a man's own crime (q), that which creates an interest in death (r), to use undue influence (s), trading with enemy in time of war (t), sale of public offices (u), an assignment of salaries and pensions (v), wagering agreements (w), agreement relating to marriage such as restraint on marriage (x), marriage brocage (y), agreement in fraud of marriage (z), concealment of adultery (a), compromise of divorce suit (b), or to obtain a divorce (c), an agreement before marriage to live separate or apart after marriage (d), or to marry on obtaining a decree of nullity of existing marriage (e), or a promise to marry after decree nisi or before decree absolute (f), or licence to commit adultery (g). Illustrations to the section.—(a) and (b) are instances of an impossible condition, (c) and (d) of conditions the fulfilment of which would be contrary to law or to morality.

Bequests.—A bequest upon an impossible condition or upon a condition, the fulfilment of which would be contrary to law or to morality is void. These are dealt with in sections 126 and 127 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, the illustrations of which are similar to illustrations in the present section.

Indian Contract Act.—Just as a conditional transfer depends upon a lawful condition, so every agreement depends upon a consideration or object which is lawful. Where they are unlawful, the agreements are void. Such agreements are dealt with in section 26 of the Indian Contract Act. Other instances of void agreements in the same Act are referred to in sections 27, 28, 30, 36 and 56.

Charitable gift.—Where a charitable gift is subject to a condition precedent, the gift fails if the condition is not satisfied (k).

Vesting of legacy.—Under section 128 of the Indian Succession Act of 1925, a condition imposed by a will before the legatee take a vested interest is considered to have been fulfilled if substantially complied with.

Condition when not complied with.—In case of a condition precedent, the performance of it subsequent to the act or event is no performance and this is rendered clear by illustration (v) of section 128 of the Indian Succession Act.

Capricious retraction of consent.—This does not deprive the legatee of his benefit, according to illustration (iv) of the above section.

Champerty and maintenance.—Maintenance is the unlawful meddling in other people's quarrels by rendering assistance either with money or otherwise from other than charitable motives (l). Champerty is the unlawful undertaking to divide the land or other matter sued for, in which the champertor has no personal interest and which he is to carry on or defend at his own expense (m). The English laws of maintenance and champerty are not enforced as specific laws in India either in the mofussil or in Presidency towns. The leading case on the subject is Ram Coomar v. Chunder Canto (n). The Privy Council held that an agreement to supply funds to carry on a suit in consideration of having a share in the property if recovered is not necessarily opposed to public policy, unless extortionate or made for the purpose of gambling in litigation.

An assignment of property, valued at Rs. 3 lakhs by the next reversioners for Rs. 52,600, of which Rs. 600 was paid at the time of execution, was held not contrary to public policy (o), nor where the lender had a share in the property sued for if recovered (p). So also a transaction which was a present transfer by the vendor of a moiety of his interest in the taluk and where it appeared that without such assistance the vendor could not have prosecuted his claim to the estate (q), was upheld. In both countries there is no distinction with regard to fruits of success in the action and whether the plaintiff obtains the same by compromise or by a decree or verdict in his favour (r). Neither an agreement to advance money in defence of an existing possession of property (s), nor the purchase of an equity of redemption, however speculative, is champertous (t). Acceptance of an inadequate price on account of need does not render the transaction invalid as being champertous (u). But a conveyance of property tending to foster gambling in litigation is void (v), so also a bond of Rs. 25,000 in consideration of the obligee agreeing to defray the expenses of an appeal to the High Court and the obligor only receiving Rs. 3,700, was held unenforceable. The Court, however, gave a decree for the actual amount advanced (w). A stipulation by an attorney to retain one moiety of what might be recovered absolutely and out of the other moiety to repay himself costs and advances made and pay the residue to the client was held void (x).

26. Where the terms of a transfer of property impose a condition to be fulfilled before a person can take an interest in the property, the condition shall be deemed to have been fulfilled if it has been substantially complied with.

Fulfilment of condition precedent.

Conditions.—The old distinction between conditions precedent and conditions subsequent, to which Lord Coke calls attention as of the first importance, is this: that, where an estate is given on a condition subsequent, the estate vests till the condition or contingency takes place, and then it operates by divesting or destroying the estate. It is resorted to in order to enforce the object of the donor by the terror of a penalty, and as it operates by the destruction of estates it is considered as odious and stricti juris. One effect of this disfavour is, that if the condition is, or by the act of God, becomes impossible, the estate is absolute as if there had been no condition. So where the condition subsequent is unlawful. Another effect of the odium under which they lie, is that they are construed strictly. Thus it appears that, in respect to the penal nature of these conditions, the phrase 'in terrorem' is peculiarly applicable to them.

The condition precedent is of quite an opposite nature ; there the estate cannot commence until the condition is performed, or the contingency has happened. The condition, therefore, is beneficial, not penal, and is favoured and benignantly interpreted, according to the intention of the words. The phrase 'in terrorm' is, therefore, from its nature, inapplicable to them and actual performance is essential to them, notwithstanding their favourable interpretation ; therefore, though the condition be impossible or illegal, no estate can arise, and it is the same as if none had been given. The result is, that, although penal conditions to destroy estates may be dispensed with, beneficial conditions to raise estates must always be complied with (y).

Fulfilment of condition precedent.—This section is supplemental to section 25. It enacts that a condition precedent shall be deemed to have been fulfilled if substantially complied with. A Mahomedan widow agreed not to transfer certain property without the consent of three persons who were the other parties to the agreement. Two of them died and a transfer by her with the consent of the survivor was not upheld (z). In the first illustration to the section where B was to marry with the consent of C, D and E, the condition was deemed to have been fulfilled by his marrying with the consent of C and D, after E's death. The Allahabad case is open to criticism that the person whose consent the widow could obtain was only one at the time of transfer and she had substantially complied with the agreement.

A bequest was made to the female children of the testator's sister on their attaining twenty-one or marrying with the consent of their parents. The elder daughter married while under age with the consent of her mother who then was a widow. It was held (reversing the decision of Jessel, M. R.), that the consent mentioned in the will must be taken to be that of parents or parent, if any, and that the daughter who had married with the consent of the surviving parent, took a vested interest in the land (a). A legacy was given to plaintiff on marriage with the consent of parents. The parents in writing gave a general consent. On the death of the surviving parent she married. It was held consent was necessary during the lifetime of the father or mother or survivor, otherwise the general consent was sufficient (b).

Where a devise determined on the devisee ceasing to use a certain house as residence, no manner or period of residence being prescribed, it was held that exclusive residence was not meant and that occasional use thereof was a substantial compliance with the condition. Failure to use the residence for four years owing to judicial proceedings brought to defeat the title of the devisee and by his inability to obtain possession from the trustees and by the unfit state thereof owing to want of repairs which were in progress, did not operate to defeat the gift (c). In another case before the same tribunal, a bequest dependent on the condition that the legatees "should they after the final Court's decision, humbly apply for subsistence" receive a certain allowance, was held not to have been complied with where letters from the legatee to the Collector of the district administering the estate asserted a right to be maintained and demanded a sum considerably larger than

Ss. 26-27 that given by the will, as also protesting against the inadequacy of the bequest and demanding "something suitable to our dignity" (d).

Consent generally.—Whether conditions be precedent or subsequent, if they are in restraint of marriage the Courts struggle to prevent a forfeiture. Trustees must consider themselves as parents and readily consent when there is no objection (e). After a lapse of 28 years consent was presumed (f). It may be expressed or implied (g). Where the marriage is to be with the consent of trustees, the consent of such as accept office is sufficient (h). A trustee is not required to show his reason for dissent (i). The consent must be free (j). A consent required to be in writing shall be deemed to be complied with if given orally (k). Consent after the act is not performance of the condition (l). Consent to marriage may be withdrawn upon good reason (m) but not capriciously (n).

27. Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created in favour of one person, and by the same transaction an ulterior disposition of the same interest is made in favour of another, if the prior disposition under the transfer shall fail, the ulterior disposition shall take effect upon the failure of the prior disposition, although the failure may not have occurred in the manner contemplated by the transferor.

Conditional transfer to one person coupled with transfer to another on failure of prior disposition.

But, where the intention of the parties to the transaction is that the ulterior disposition shall take effect only in the event of the prior disposition failing in a particular manner, the ulterior disposition shall not take effect unless the prior disposition fails in that manner.

is out of the case, the subsequent limitation takes place (o). The rule of English Law is, where a testator manifests a clear intention to give a benefit to certain objects on an event which happens, the legatee shall not be deprived of it although a circumstance inadvertently coupled with it in the language used, does not literally take place (p).

A testator devised a term of years to his wife for life and after her death to the child she was then enceinte with ; but if such child died before twenty-one then he devised one-third part of the term to his wife. The wife was not enceinte at the time of the devise. It was held that the devise to her was good though the contingency never happened (q), and so where the child expected was a son and turned out to be a daughter (r). In such cases where there is a gift over at marriage it falls within the well-known rule in Jones v. Westcomb (s) and takes effect either on death or on marriage. A testator gave property to trustees on trust for his son for life until he should become bankrupt or insolvent and then over. Such a limitation is good in English Law (t) but would be void under section 12 of the Transfer of Property Act.

Acceleration of remainder on failure of life estate.—A gift in remainder expectant on the termination of an estate for life does not fail but is accelerated by reason of the gift of such prior life estate not taking effect (u). An award appointed D. the dedicator as first manager for twenty-one years and on the expiration of his term appointed his younger brother R. as manager for twenty-one years and on the expiry of his term, S. the third son of the dedicator, was to be manager for twenty-one years, thereafter the eldest son of D. then the eldest son of R. and then the eldest son of S. and so on. R. died before the completion of the full term of twenty-one years. S. had predeceased R. The eldest son of R. claimed the right of management for the unexpired portion of the term of twenty-one years. Held that the right of managership given to R. was personal to him, and on his death before completion of his term and S. dying before R, the result was to accelerate the succession of the eldest son of D. (v). In an earlier case a testator directed his widow to adopt a son but on the death of the adopted son without leaving issue, his estate was to be divided equally between his two daughters. The authority to adopt having been declared invalid, it was held that the bequest to adopt a son having failed, such failure did not make the bequest void but the daughters took an absolute interest under the will of the testator as tenants in common (w).

Proviso.—According to this, the subsequent limitation does not take effect unless the prior disposition fails in the manner contemplated by the transferor. A similar provision is made in section 130 of the Indian Succession Act.

Illustration (b).—Prior to the Law of Property Act, 1925, by the law of England the question of survivorship in cases, of which the illustration is an example, was a matter of evidence and not of positive regulation and enactment, as in the French Code, and in the absence of evidence there was no conclusion of law on the subject. The illustration recalls the case of Underwood v. Wing (x). The English Law, however, is now altered and the presumption in simultaneous deaths by the Law of Property Act, 1925, section 184, is that in all cases where two or more persons have died in circumstances rendering it uncertain which of them survived the other or others, such deaths for the purpose of affecting title to the property are to be presumed to have occurred in the order of seniority and the younger shall be deemed to have survived the elder.

Conditional bequests and devises.—The Indian Succession Act of 1925 contains provisions similar to section 27 of the Transfer of Property Act. The rule enunciated in the section is similar to that in section 129 of the Indian Succession Act and that in the proviso as in section 130.

A testator bequeathed the residue of his estate to his grandsons who might be born to his son K. within ten years after his death and failing such grandsons to his grand-daughters equally after the death of his wife. A grandson was born within ten years of his death. It was held that the bequest in favour of the grandson being to a person not in existence, was invalid. Further, as the grandson was in existence the bequest in favour of the grand-daughters could not take effect under section 130 of the Indian Succession Act which applied to Hindu wills. Therefore, the grandson took the whole estate as heir-at-law (y). The illustration to section 130 of the Indian Succession Act which is identical with section (b) of the present section recalls the case of Underwood v. Wing (z), the first illustration to section 129, Meadows v. Parry (a), and the second illustration, Avelyn v. Ward (b). Other cases illustrating section 129 are collected in William on Executors, 12th Ed., Vol. II, pp. 820-822, Theobald on Wills, 8th Ed., pp. 738-740, Jarman on Wills, 7th Ed., pp. 2134-2138.

28. On a transfer of property an interest therein may be created to accrue to any person with the condition superadded that in case a specified uncertain event shall happen such interest shall pass to another person, or that in case a specified uncertain event shall not happen such interest shall pass to another person. In each case the dispositions are subject to the rules contained in sections 10, 12, 21, 23, 24, 25 and 27.

Ulterior transfer conditional on happening or not happening of specified event.

Condition subsequent.—This section deals with the subject known to law as condition subsequent or, to use the phrase in the section, condition superadded. These are dealt with in a group formed of sections 28, 29 and 30. The considerations applicable to conditions subsequent seem to be totally different from the considerations applicable to conditions precedent grouped under sections 25, 26 and 27

In the present group of cases there is a clear original vested gift in certain defined persons and there is a clear condition subsequent taking the benefits away from them on specified conditions. The object of conditions subsequent is to determine and divest (upon the happening of the event specified) estates or interests antecedently vested. If, therefore, the condition be void, the gift will be absolute.

If a condition attached to a devise is capable of being construed either as a condition precedent or as a condition subsequent, the Court will prefer the latter construction (c). The condition subsequent must be subsequent to the actual enjoyment in possession of the estate. The obligation to perform the condition does not arise until after possession is taken. The obligation to do the act and the immunity from doing it, are both measured by the same standard, namely, what are the limits of the condition,—when does the obligation arise under the condition? When you once come to the conclusion that the condition is intended to operate only after the devisee comes into possession, the occasion for any excuse for his not performing it, arises then and not till then, and it is unnecessary to consider whether he could or could not perform it before. A clause of defeasance, in order to be operative, must contain express words or words of necessary implication of a gift over to a definite person (d). A testator by his will made a settlement of his property in favour of his grand-children on the express condition that during their respective minorities they should not reside abroad except for a period not exceeding six weeks in each year. Upon non-compliance their shares were to be forfeited. Held that the condition was a condition subsequent, and as its non-compliance was void as being contrary to public policy as tending to the possible separation of parents from their children, the condition was void (e). A condition divesting the interest of a devisee or legatee if he enters into the naval or military services of the country is void as against public policy (f). A Hindu may create a life estate or successive life estates. But a series of absolute estates defeasible in succession on the happening of an uncertain event cannot be considered as a succession of life estates. It can only be considered as an attempt to create a state of inheritance which is not recognized by Hindu Law. These were the observations in a Bombay case which was decided on section 131 of the Indian Succession Act, corresponding to the present section. A testator bequeathed his property successively to the three sons of his sister subject to the condition that, if the first died without male issue surviving, it was to go to the second, who was similarly liable to be defeated if he in his turn died without leaving male issue, in which event the property was to go to the third son subject to a similar condition. Ultimately, the property was devised in favour of charity. The first two sons having died without male issue surviving, the third son sued for construction of the will. Held, the first son took an absolute estate which on his death would go to his daughter as his heiress. Here the testator intended that the bequest to the first son should be defeasible. If he died without male issue then there should be a gift over. But he attached a condition to that gift over, and he attempted to restrict the inheritance of his estate in a manner contrary to the principles of Hindu Law (g). A testator by his will directed that any child of his taking any interest thereunder should, in respect of other funds to which the child would become entitled, execute a settlement to the satisfaction of the testator's trustees on the lines laid down in the will. The will contained a forfeiture clause if the directions as to the settlement were not complied with. The son of the testator (the settlor) executed a settlement and the recitals in the deed stated his desire to execute it in accordance with the testator's directions. The will trustees expressed themselves satisfied with the settlement. It stated, inter alia : " If the settlor shall not have had any child who under the trusts in default of appointment hereintofore contained shall attain a vested interest in the trust fund, then . . . the trust fund . . . shall be held as to one-half thereof in trust for such person or persons as the settlor shall by will or codicil appoint, and as to the other half part . . . shall be dealt with as if the settlor had died in the lifetime of the (testator) without leaving any child living at the death of the said (testator)." Held (Lord Blanesburgh dissenting), that the satisfaction of the trustees was not conclusive ; that the recitals and operative part of the settlement, though clear, were inconsistent and the operative part prevailed ; that the settlement reproduced the words of the testator's will, which referred to the son's portion, whereas the settlement referred to the son's trust fund ; that the stated hypothesis of the son's death in his father's lifetime, though apt to determine the destination of the testator's own property, was not sufficient to determine that of the son's own property ; that there was a resulting trust to the son ; that there was consequently by the terms of the testator's will a forfeiture of the settlor's interest of his portion under the will (h).

Condition subsequent ineffectual.—Where the condition subsequent is uncertain or is contrary to public policy or impossible, it is void and ineffectual, although there may be a gift over and the gift over is also ineffectual (i).

Validity of condition.—A condition subsequent to be valid must be one which, if it forms the consideration of an agreement or contract, the agreement or contract would be valid.

Time for performance.—The section does not make any reference to the time in which a condition subsequent must be performed. There is no general rule in computing time. Each case depends upon the reason of the thing according to the circumstances (j). Even if it be performed subsequent to the time fixed for performance and the Court finds that all parties can be put in substantially the same position as they would have been, had the condition been performed within the proper time, time is not regarded as of the essence and such performance is treated as a sufficient compliance of the condition (k).

Ignorance of condition subsequent.—Ignorance of a condition subsequent cannot prevent a forfeiture clause for breach of the condition coming into operation (l). But where there was a gift over upon " refusal or neglect " to take the name and arms of the testator, and failure to comply with the condition was through ignorance of existence of the will, it was held that the estate was not forfeited as the expression " refuse or neglect " is not equivalent to " fail " or " omit " as it implies a conscious act of volition (m).

Certainty.—One of the cardinal rules on this subject has been this, that where a vested estate is to be defeated by a condition on a contingency that is to happen afterwards, that condition must be such that the Court can see from the beginning, precisely and distinctly, upon the happening of what event it was that the preceding vested estate was to determine (n). Limitation must be certain not only in expression but also in operation (o).

Impossibility.—If a condition annexed to a gift or legacy be impossible at the time of imposing it, the gift or legacy can never take effect. The testator devised the residue of his estate to J, provided she married with the consent of his two executors. One of them died. The condition being subsequent became impossible and she could therefore marry without the consent of the survivor (p). In such cases the performance is dispensed with and the gift becomes absolute (q), but where the consent is to be obtained, as of a guardian, and if there is no guardian, it cannot be said that the condition was complied with, for a guardian could have been appointed (r). Whenever the Courts take notice of a condition impossible, it must be a natural impossibility arising from an act subsequent, which the party could not avoid, having become impossible by an act of God (s). Lunacy has been held to be an act of God making performance of condition impossible, and the condition being subsequent, the legatee takes an absolute estate (t). A settlement for two daughters provided that if either married without the consent of their mother, it should be to her separate use. After proposing and encouraging the marriage of one of them the mother refused to give her consent out of resentment. The marriage held without her consent was held to be no forfeiture (u). A consent may be withdrawn if subsequent circumstances justified it. This power is not unlimited and cannot be exercised for mere caprice (v). A bequest to a testator's son contained a condition prohibiting marriage with two named persons with a gift over on breach of condition. The son married, but none of the two named persons. It was held that the condition was not impossible of fulfilment so long as the plaintiff and either of the two ladies survived and, therefore, the bequest took effect subject to defeasance on breach of the condition at any time (w).

Exemption.—A condition subsequent was that each of the daughters of the settlor should settle her interest under her mother's marriage settlement upon certain trusts. The daughters who executed settlements in the testator's lifetime with his concurrence were held exempt from the performance of the condition though the trusts of the settlement were not absolutely identical with the trusts of the will, and in one particular were opposed to the provisions of the will of the testator, their father (x). The true principle in this class of cases where conditions are dispensed with, is not that of considering that the condition has been fulfilled but that the child or other persons entitled under the will are exempt from the condition altogether, so that the will must be read as if there was no condition.

Indian Succession Act, 1925.—Section 28 corresponds to section 131 of this Act except that in the Transfer of Property Act the dispositions are subject to certain rules enumerated in section 28, while under the Indian Succession Act it is only the ulterior bequest that is subject to the parallel rules contained in section 131 of the Indian Succession Act.

Condition of residence.—Residence must be personal (y). Residence has been decided not to require that a man shall actually sleep there every night (z). Although the words of the will were not fulfilled literally, it was held that there was no forfeiture where the tenant for life was directed to reside upon the messuage at least every six calendar months in a year, and on his failure to do so there was a gift over. The tenant for life did not reside as directed, but had in the house a staff and servants, paid the rates and kept horses and poultry, and his son stayed in the house on an average on every alternate Saturday till Monday (a). In a later case, “residing” was held to mean “personally residing.” By his will a testator gave his leasehold house to trustees to permit his niece C to hold and occupy the same free of rent on the express condition that after his decease his niece C should “remain single and unmarried,” and in the event of her marriage she was to forfeit the bequest and it was to fall in the residue. C resided until marriage and ten years thereafter and then her husband took another house in the neighbourhood and she moved into it with him. She let all the rooms but kept one for herself and in it she kept a bed, her books, some clothes, writing materials, etc., and retained the key. She went there two or three times a week and occasionally had meals and slept there. It was held that what C had done did not amount to residing within the meaning of the will, but reading the subsequent void condition in restraint of marriage into the condition as to residence on marriage, the latter condition did not apply and there was no forfeiture (b). But where a direction in a will “provided, that in the event of my said niece voluntarily ceasing to make the said dwelling house her permanent home as aforesaid, I direct the said sum of £7,000 and the investment representing the same shall fall in the residue,” it was held that there was no forfeiture where the niece on marriage, in pursuance of her husband’s injunction and because he wished to make another house the matrimonial home, complied with his instructions. It was there held that voluntarily meant “freely without compulsion” and “not under any obligation” and that having acted in pursuance of a legal duty to her husband, she would not cease to use the dwelling house, her permanent home, voluntarily (c). There are many authorities, ancient and modern, showing that the Courts abhor provisions in instruments of whatever kind contemplating the interruption of conjugal relations and hold such provisions void as against the policy of the law. One of the terms of a will was that if any female member of the testator’s family should live in any other than a holy place for more than three months she should forfeit her rights under the will. The plaintiff, a minor daughter-in-law, was forcibly removed from her house with the aid of the police, and resided for more than three months with her mother. It was held that absence under duress did not work a forfeiture (d). Reference was made to a passage in the judgment of Lord Campbell in Clavering v. Ellison (e): “Had the children been included in the arrest I conceive that their residence abroad under continued duress would not have worked a forfeiture, and if their residence abroad may be fairly ascribed to the imprisonment of their father by Napoleon, the forfeiture might be saved on this ground, were there a necessity to resort to it." This case could have been decided equally in the plaintiff's favour on the ground of infancy.

But maintenance of an establishment was held insufficient and personal residence considered necessary where trustees were directed by a testator to pay the income of the residuary estate to the tenant for life of a certain property during such period of his life as he should reside on the property for a limited period in every year, there being a gift over of the income in the event of his ceasing or declining so to reside (f). A Hindu testator directed that his two wives should live in the family dwelling house or, according to the rules of Hindu religion, in some holy place, and each should receive a monthly allowance of Rs. 10 for maintenance, with a gift over. If either acted contrary to the will, she should be deprived of all interest. The younger widow who broke the condition relating to residence forfeited her interest (g).

Infancy.—An infant is not bound by a condition subsequent requiring residence inasmuch as he has no power to choose his own place of residence (h).

Repugnant conditions.—If a condition subsequent which is to defeat an estate is against the policy of the law, the gift is absolute, but if the illegal condition is precedent, there is no gift.

A condition against alienation is void.—The difference between a condition properly so called and a conditional limitation or an executory devise is that in the case of a condition, the estate is to revert to the grantor or his heirs, and in other cases it is limited over to other persons. A limitation to the use of A and his heirs till C returns from London and after the return of C, to the use of B in fee, is in a deed a conditional limitation, in a will an executory devise. A limitation which defeats a portion of the estate previously given is a conditional limitation as distinguished from condition, of which only the grantor or his heirs can take advantage. If an estate is given to A for life with remainder to B absolutely with a proviso that if A should attempt to assign, his life estate should cease, such a proviso is read as a limitation to A during his life or until he should attempt to assign, and upon that event or after his death, such a limitation is held to be valid.

The general law is that a defeasance, either by condition or by conditional limitation or executory devise, cannot be well limited to take effect in derogation, not merely of the right of alienation, but of any of the natural incidents of the estate which it is intended to divest (i). An incident of the estate given which cannot be directly taken away or prevented by the donor cannot be taken away indirectly by a condition which would cause the estate to revert to the donor or by conditional limitation or executory devise which would cause it to shift to another person. A testatrix gave certain estates to her son, but if he did or suffered any act, in consequence whereof he would be deprived of the personal beneficial enjoyment thereof, then the trust was to cease and the estate held in trust for his wife, or, if no wife then living, for his children equally. The son survived his mother, and was a bachelor.—Held that he took an absolute

S. 28 interest under the gift, and that the attempted executory gift over was void for repugnancy (j). The general principle as enunciated above is subject to many important exceptions, one of them being an executory devise defeating or abridging an estate in fee by altering the course of its devolution which is to take effect at the moment of devolution and at no other time. Another exception is that any executory devise which is to defeat an estate and which is to take effect on the exercise of any of the rights incident to that, is void. It is clear that under the extreme freedom of disposition allowed to testators, a gift by will which is absolute in the first instance may in general be modified by subsequent words cutting down or divesting the gift on any contingency the testator may think fit to select. B died leaving a certain immoveable property to his son R. under a will with the words, "should my son R. die, which God forbid, and should he then leave a son, such his son shall afterwards be the owner thereof." It was held that R. took only a life-interest (k).

But the contingency must not be so selected as to run counter to the general policy of the law. Thus gifts over on any of the following contingencies, amongst others, are bad, namely, (a) any contingency that is too remote, (b) the contingency of any marriage whatsoever, (c) the contingency of alienation, (d) the contingency of bankruptcy, or (e) the contingency of intestacy. The same principle is affirmed in India and there is a large number of decisions of the Indian Courts which supports this principle. A gift over is void for repugnance where the estate conferred is of an absolute nature. Where it was found that a testator had intended to give an absolute estate and attempted to limit the rights of the holder owing to an erroneous view of his powers, the attempt to limit the rights must be rejected on the ground of repugnance (l). The same principle has been followed by the Courts of Bombay (m), Calcutta (n) and Lahore (o).

Gift over.—It is clearly settled that a gift over upon an attempt to alienate an absolute interest previously given is as void as a condition (p).

Change of religion.—A testatrix limited to a daughter an exclusive power of appointment by will amongst her children. The daughter appointed among the objects of the power and declared that if either during her life or after her death any son or daughter should marry a person not professing the Jewish religion or should forsake the Jewish and adopt the Christian or any other religion, such son or daughter should forfeit all share in the fund, which was to accrue and go over to the other children living at the date of forfeiture. A son of the testatrix married a Christian without her consent. A daughter embraced Christianity after her mother's death. Both children were born after the death of the creator of the power. Held, the forfeiture clause was not void against public policy. The share of the son was forfeited, but as regards the daughter, so far as it affected after the death of the appointor the share of a child born after the death of the creator of the power, it was void for remoteness and consequently the daughter had not forfeited her share (q). Ss. 28-29

Marriage.—All general restraints upon marriage are void (r). But not if the restraint is with a view to protect a child or in cases where marriage of a woman is prohibited on the ground that it would lead to the neglect of the testator's child or might result in another man's spending his hard-earned money (s). Or where a condition subsequent is in restraint of a marriage of a single woman on the ground of health, or provision being only intended until marriage (t). A condition subsequent in partial restraint of marriage is valid if accompanied by a gift over (u).

29. An ulterior disposition of the kind contemplated by the last preceding section cannot take effect unless the condition is strictly fulfilled.

Fulfilment of condition subsequent.

Illustration.

A transfers Rs. 500 to B, to be paid to him on his attaining his majority or marrying, with a proviso that, if B dies a minor or marries without C's consent, the Rs. 500 shall go to D. B marries when only 17 years of age, without C's consent. The transfer to D takes effect.

The section.—This section is supplemental to section 28.

Condition is strictly fulfilled.—Unlike a condition precedent, the law demands, in the case of a condition subsequent, literal compliance. The reason is that the law favours vesting and abhors divesting and as clauses dealing with condition subsequent are in defeasance of estates vested, they are to be construed more stringently (v). In a subsequent case (w) Kindersley, V. C., said "that the contingency should be so expressed as not to leave it in any degree doubtful or uncertain what the contingency is which is intended to defeat the prior estate" (x).

Indian Succession Act, section 132.—This section corresponds with section 29 of the Transfer of Property Act. Illustration (i) to this section and illustration (ii) to section 128 as well as illustration (a) to section 26 of the Transfer of Property Act point out the distinction between the fulfilment of a condition precedent and a condition subsequent.

Defeasance must "fit" the condition.—Usually in a clause containing a condition subsequent there is a gift over in default of performance when the condition is not fulfilled and where there is a default, the gift over takes effect. For this purpose, residue is a gift over but it is doubted if a residuary bequest is such (y). A gift over cannot be implied (z).

In construing clauses of defeasance, two rules are to be observed, the first rule is to construe the clause most strictly. The next rule is that the cesser, and the limitation over must fit in with one another, otherwise the gift is absolute. Such was the opinion expressed in Catt's Trusts (a). In that case the limitation was in fee and the gift over was that it should cease and be void to all intents and purposes, and was to go over in the same manner as if they were dead. In a subsequent case the gift was in fee simple and was to go over to those entitled in remainder. As there could be none such, the clause was held to be absolutely void (b).

Revocation clause.—It is quite clear that if a testator desires a gift to be revoked the mere fact that there is no gift over will not prevent the revocation from taking effect. For this purpose it is not necessary to consider whether the condition is precedent or subsequent. If the clause for cesser and the gift over do not fit in with each other, the whole clause would be ineffectual and the gift would be absolute, on the ground that defeasance does not fit the condition (c). In an earlier case a testator gave a legacy to his daughter for life and the remainder in trust for her children. By a codicil he revoked the bequest to the daughter in case she became a nun. The daughter took the veil. Held, the condition was a lawful one although there was no gift over. On breach of the condition, her interest under the bequest ceased (d).

Effect of a void condition.—If a condition be void in its inception, the gift itself is void if the condition is a condition precedent. It is absolute if the condition is a condition subsequent.

Prior disposition not affected by invalidity of ulterior disposition.

30. If the ulterior disposition is not valid, the prior disposition is not affected by it.

Illustration.

A transfers a farm to B for her life, and, if she does not desert her husband, to C. B is entitled to the farm during her life as if no condition had been inserted.

Gift over void.—Section 30 enacts that if a gift over be void the original disposition is not affected. A Hindu executed a Deed of Settlement excluding his son from inheritance as he was of bad character and made a gift of his property to his wife (the Rani) appointing her successor and representative subject to conditions, of which condition 6 was that if during the succeeding years a lawful son was born to his son who was excluded, he should take the property on attaining majority. It was held that the grandson took the estate by virtue of a condition subsequent terminating the estate limited to the Rani and her successors in the event of his attaining majority and that this condition of defeasance being illegal and void under Hindu Law as being in favour of an unborn person, it was inoperative and void and left the Rani's estate unaffected (e).

Prior disposition not enlarged.—This section does not enlarge the nature of the interest created in the first instance by reason of the subsequent disposition being invalid.

Prior disposition void.—This section enacts that if an ulterior disposition is not valid the prior disposition is not affected by such invalidity. The converse is not true as under section 16 if a prior disposition fails the ulterior disposition falls with it. Ss. 30-31

Ulterior disposition void.—Circumstances rendering ulterior dispositions void are discussed in the notes to sections 28 and 29.

Indian Succession Act, section 133.—This section corresponds with section 30 of the Transfer of Property Act.

31. Subject to the provisions of section 12, on a transfer of property an interest therein may be created with the condition super-added that it shall cease to exist in case a specified uncertain event shall happen, or in case a specified uncertain event shall not happen.

Condition that transfer shall cease to have effect in case specified uncertain event happens or does not happen.

Illustrations.

(a) A transfers a farm to B for his life, with a proviso that, in case B cuts down a certain wood, the transfer shall cease to have any effect. B cuts down the wood. He loses his life-interest in the farm.

(b) A transfers a farm to B, provided that, if B shall not go to England within three years after the date of the transfer, his interest in the farm shall cease. B does not go to England within the term prescribed. His interest in the farm ceases.

Condition superadded.—It is permissible under this section to create an estate by the addition of a condition subsequent whereby on the happening or non-happening of a specified uncertain event, such an estate is to determine. An estate so created is known in English Law as a “determinable fee simple” (f). Unlike section 28, there is no gift over in the case contemplated by this section. It does not originate but determines an estate. The estate created may be a qualified estate as in illustration (a) or an absolute estate as in illustration (b). Examples of conditions subsequent in defeasance of a vested estate are afforded by cases relating to residence, marriage settlements, name and arms clauses, introduced in English will settlements and leases. A clause in a deed laying down that an absolute estate was to be divested on the happening of a particular contingency is not to be treated as invalid. It is neither the law in England nor in India (g).

Exceptions.—The rule in the section is subject to exceptions mentioned in section 12 by which a condition that an absolute transfer is to determine on the transferee becoming insolvent or endeavouring to transfer or dispose of the property is void.

Indian Succession Act, section 134.—This section corresponds with section 31 of the Transfer of Property Act.

Hindu Law.—Provisions for defeasance on the occurrence of an uncertain event are legal and enforceable subject to two limitations, viz., that no rule of Hindu Law will be infringed and the rights of a transferee for consideration without notice will be protected. A Hindu made a gift of his property on condition that it should

Ss. 31-32 be restored to him on his return from Port Blair. It was held that the clause of reverter was valid and enforceable against the transferee as well as his heirs (h).

Performance or non-performance of condition subsequent.—The performance or non-performance of a condition subsequent under this section differs from the performance or non-performance of a condition subsequent referred to in section 28. In section 31 there is no gift over but a mere cessation of the interest created. In section 28 there is a gift over on defeasance. Further, section 29 which is supplemental to and follows section 28 requires the condition subsequent to be strictly fulfilled. No such imposition is laid in case of a condition subsequent within the meaning of section 31. This section is founded on an English case (i).

The non-performance of a condition subsequent under section 31 can be compensated in damages but if the condition be in the nature of a penalty the Court will relieve against it (j).

Purchaser's failure to pay within a time fixed.—The vendor who had only received a part of the purchase-money signed an acknowledgment in the conveyance of 15th July 1925 for the entire consideration. The purchaser agreed to pay the balance to the vendor's creditors by the 30th December 1925 and on his failure the sale deed was to stand cancelled null and void. On the purchaser's failure the vendor maintained that this was a superadded condition within the meaning of section 31 and on its breach the rights of the purchaser automatically ceased. Their Lordships held that the receipt of the entire consideration by the vendor could not be taken literally, so as to contradict a clear fact, that the balance had not been paid but was to be paid by the date prescribed and that in their opinion there was nothing in section 31 which declared that a limitation upon a condition subsequent was a lawful method of grant to exclude the right of the Court to give relief to the purchaser who failed to make payment of the price or part thereof by the date agreed upon in the contract of sale, which in the present case was embodied in the same deed as the act of transfer (k).

32. In order that a condition that an interest shall cease to exist may be valid, it is necessary that the event to which it relates be one which could legally constitute the condition of the creation of an interest.

Such condition must not be invalid.

Termination of an estate by means of the annexation of a condition.—A condition subsequent under section 31 as would effectively determine an estate created must be such, that if it were a condition precedent, it would not be invalid under section 25, that is to say, a condition void in originating an estate is equally void in determining an estate. If a condition be annexed to an estate which would otherwise be absolute, then on the happening of the condition the estate is defeated.

Effect of invalid condition subsequent.—The effect of a condition invalid under this section is not to defeat the estate but the transferee takes the estate free from the obligation to perform the condition.

The rule against perpetuities.—In case of an estate limited as in the section the specified uncertain event may be beyond the limit of the rule against perpetuities.

Numerous decisions in America have sustained conditions violating the rule against perpetuities without any objection of remoteness occurring to anyone, thus creating an exception, arbitrary though it be, to the rule against perpetuities (l). There is no trace in the books of any rule which limited the period during which the determination of an estate by condition should take effect and it is abundantly clear that the modern rule could not have applied because the donor took not by way of new limitation but by the determination of the estate given (m).

Indian Succession Act, section 135.—This section corresponds with section 32.

33. Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created subject to a condition that the person taking it shall perform a certain act, but no time is specified for the performance of the Act, the condition is broken when he renders impossible, permanently or for an indefinite period, the performance of the act.

Transfer conditional on performance of act, no time being specified for performance.

No time for performance of the Act.—Where no time is fixed for the performance of a condition on which a transfer depends, it is deemed to be broken where its performance is rendered impossible either permanently or for an indefinite period by the grantee. The condition in the section is a condition precedent.

English Law different.—A devise in the following terms, "if either of the devisees should marry into the families of Rivington or Gosling, and have a son, I give all my estate to him for life with remainders over; if not, to Randal." The devisees married, but not into the favoured families. Lord Thurlow held that till they married, nothing could vest, for marriage was a condition precedent: then could anything vest till the whole contingency became impossible? That suspends it during their lives. You suppose if they once married, they had lost all chance of marrying a Rivington or a Gosling; if he had said so, it would have been very well. Suppose the girls had married against consent, one of the husbands had died, and she had married into one of the favoured families, and had a son, and that son was here claiming the estate, the Court would not incline to refuse him" (n). In another case, a testator devised the estate on condition that the devisee take and use the testator's name. The devisee died without having taken the testator's name. For eighteen months previous to his death he had suffered from insanity and for six months previous to his death was in an asylum (o). It was held that before the plaintiff could succeed it was necessary to establish each of the two things, viz., (1) that the condition in question was not a condition precedent but subsequent, and (2) that the performance of the condition became impossible by the act of God and not by mere default of the devisee.

Indian Succession Act, section 136.—This section differs from section 33. Estates there referred to do not depend on a condition precedent but are either a Indian Contract Act, section 34.—According to the rule in this section, where no time is fixed for performance of a contingent contract, it shall be deemed impossible of performance when the person on whose conduct it depends, does anything which renders it impossible within any definite time or otherwise than under further contingencies. The illustration is an example of a condition precedent.

34. Where an act is to be performed by a person either as a condition to be fulfilled before an interest created on a transfer of property is enjoyed by him, or as a condition on the non-fulfilment of which the interest is to pass from him to another person, and a time is specified for the performance of the act, if such performance within the specified time is prevented by the fraud of a person who would be directly benefited by non-fulfilment of the condition, such further time shall as against him be allowed for performing the act as shall be requisite to make up for the delay caused by such fraud. But if no time is specified for the performance of the act, then, if its performance is by the fraud of a person interested in the non-fulfilment of the condition rendered impossible or indefinitely postponed, the condition shall as against him be deemed to have been fulfilled.

Transfer conditional on performance of act, time being specified.

Transfers within the section.—The following are within the scope of the section.

- (1) Transfer subject to a condition precedent.
- (2) Transfer subject to a condition subsequent.

Nature of fraud.—Where time is specified, the fraud must be such as to prevent performance within the specified time. Where no time is fixed, it must be such as to render performance impossible or indefinitely to postpone it.

Essential features of fraud.—Fraud is defined in section 17 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872. To quote the words of Lord Cairns, "There must, in my opinion, be some active mis-statement of fact, or, at all events, such a partial and fragmentary statement of fact, as that the withholding of that which is not stated makes that which is stated, absolutely false" (p). The statement must be false to the knowledge of the person making it. "The general rule of law", said Bramwell, L. J., "is clear that no action is maintainable for a mere statement, although untrue, and although acted on to the damage of the person to whom it is made, unless that statement is false to the knowledge of the person making it" (q). To this rule should be added what Lord Herschell said, "First in order to sustain an action of deceit there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Secondly, fraud is proved when it is shown that a false representation has been made, (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false. Although I have treated the second and third as distinct cases, I think the third is but an instance of the second, for one who makes a statement under such circumstances can have no real belief in the truth of what he states" (r).

Who must commit the fraud.—The fraud must be :

- (a) Where time is fixed
 - (i) of the person who would be directly benefited by the non-fulfilment of the condition
- (b) Where no time is fixed
 - (i) of the person interested in the non-fulfilment of the condition.

Remedy for fraud.—(a) When time is specified.

- (i) Is to allow the grantee further time as would make up for the delay caused by such fraud.

(b) Where no time is specified,

- (i) Is to consider the condition as fulfilled if the performance is rendered impossible or indefinitely postponed.

Indian Succession Act, section 137.—This section corresponds to the first half of section 34 except that in the Indian Succession Act there are three kinds of transfer enumerated instead of two as in section 34.

Election.

35. (1) Where a person professes to transfer property which he has no right to transfer, and as part of the same transaction confers any benefit on the owner of the property, such owner must elect either to confirm such transfer or to dissent from it; and in the latter case he shall relinquish the benefit so conferred, and the benefit so relinquished shall revert to the transferor or his representative as if it had not been disposed of,

subject nevertheless, where the transfer is gratuitous, and the transferor has, before the election, died or otherwise become incapable of making a fresh transfer, and in all cases where the transfer is for consideration, to the charge of making good to the disappointed transferee the amount or value of the property attempted to be transferred to him.

Illustrations.

The farm of Sultanpur is the property of C and worth Rs. 800. A by an instrument of gift professes to transfer it to B, giving by the same instrument Rs. 1,000 to C. C elects to retain the farm. He forfeits the gift of Rs. 1,000.

(r) Derry v. Peek (1889) 14 A. C. 337.

In the same case, A dies before the election. His representative must out of the Rs. 1,000 pay Rs. 800 to B.

(2) The rule in the first paragraph of this section applies whether the transferor does or does not believe that which he professes to transfer to be his own.

(3) A person taking no benefit directly under a transaction, but deriving a benefit under it indirectly, need not elect.

(4) A person who in his one capacity takes a benefit under the transaction may in another dissent therefrom.

Exception to the last preceding four rules.—Where a particular benefit is expressed to be conferred on the owner of the property which the transferor professes to transfer, and such benefit is expressed to be in lieu of that property, if such owner claim the property, he must relinquish the particular benefit, but he is not bound to relinquish any other benefit conferred upon him by the same transaction.

(5) Acceptance of the benefit by the person on whom it is conferred constitutes an election by him to confirm the transfer, if he is aware of his duty to elect, and of those circumstances which would influence the judgment of a reasonable man in making an election, or if he waives inquiry into the circumstances.

(6) Such knowledge or waiver shall, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, be presumed, if the person on whom the benefit has been conferred has enjoyed it for two years without doing any act to express dissent.

(7) Such knowledge or waiver may be inferred from any act of his which renders it impossible to place the persons interested in the property professed to be transferred in the same condition as if such act had not been done.

Illustration.

A transfers to B an estate to which C is entitled, and as part of the same transaction gives C a coal-mine. C takes possession of the mine and exhausts it. He has thereby confirmed the transfer of the estate to B.

(8) If he does not, within one year after the date of the transfer, signify to the transferor or his representatives his intention to confirm or to dissent from the transfer, the transferor or his representatives may, upon the expiration of that period, require him to make his election; and, if he does not comply with such requisition within a reasonable time after he has received it, he shall be deemed to have elected to confirm the transfer. S. 35

(9) In case of disability, the election shall be postponed until the disability ceases, or until the election is made by some competent authority.

Parallels of election.—The Indian Succession Act, XXXIX of 1925, enacts a series of rules in sections 180 to 190 as applicable to testamentary instruments similar to the rules laid down in section 35 of this Act for the construction of deeds inter vivos.

Application of rule.—The rule in the section applies to interests immediate, remote, contingent (s) of value or not of value (t). It applies to persons governed by Hindu (u) and Mahomedan Law (v).

Nature of property to which the rule applies.—The rule applies to properties either or both of which are moveable or immoveable.

Election.—By the doctrine of election is understood that when a person coming to claim under an instrument says if it be a will, "pay me the legacy," or "hand over to me the particular property given to me by that instrument," the executors have the right to say "you must conform to all the provisions of the instrument." And if the instrument also disposes, or purports to dispose, of property which belongs by paramount title to the person claiming under it, a case of election arises, and he cannot take under it the benefit which it gives him unless he is prepared to fulfil the gift which it purports to make of his own property. In short, the rule may be stated in this form, that no one can take under and against the same instrument, but taking under it such person is bound to fulfil all its provisions (w). By the well-settled doctrine which is termed in the Scottish Law the doctrine of "approbate" and "reprobate" and in our Courts, the doctrine of "election," where a deed or will professes to make a general disposition of property for the benefit of a person named in it, such a person cannot accept a benefit under the instrument without at the same time conforming to all its provisions and renouncing every right inconsistent with them (x), the maxim being "qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus."

Actual election and a duty to elect are distinct.—In all cases of election, a party having two claims has an option of either and cannot be held concluded by equivocal acts performed in ignorance of the value of the funds or properties or in ignorance of the necessity of electing. It must be collected from circumstances that there was an apprehension in his mind that he was under a duty to elect and that the particular acts relied upon to constitute election were intended by him to have that effect (y).

The rule as to election is to be applied as between a gift under a will and a claim de hors the will and adverse to it and is not to be applied between one clause in a will and another clause in the same will (z). The same rule would apply to a deed.

Election when necessary.—In order to raise a case of election both the transfer of property belonging to a third person by the transferor and the conferring by him of a benefit on the owner of that property must be part of one and the same transaction (a).

Dispositions by separate instruments.—The dispositions which give rise to the application of the doctrine may be by the same instrument or by a separate instrument provided that in the latter case the two deeds are part of the same scheme or transaction (b).

Owner.—The word is used in a very wide sense and includes persons who have not only vested but contingent rights, reversionary and remote as well as immediate interests (c).

Benefit.—In order to raise a case of election, the owner of the property must derive some benefit thereby. If he does not obtain any benefit which is an essential basis of the rule, no question of election can arise. In such a case the question would arise whether the disappointed transferee would be entitled to compensation if the nature of the transaction is such as not to confer any benefit on the owner of the property. It is submitted that he would not be entitled to any compensation as the case would not be one within the doctrine of the rule. A transfer for a man's benefit for the purpose of election would be regarded as a transfer made to himself (d). The benefit may be moveable or immovable. Both under the rule and the illustration the property transferred to the real owner is higher in value than his own, otherwise there would be no benefit.

Both provisions.—The answer to the question whether the owner of the property can retain his own property and the benefit conferred on him by the transferor and claim to make good by way of compensation to the disappointed transferee the value of the property belonging to him, would be, that he cannot have both the provisions, for if he elects to retain his own property he is deemed to have dissented from the transfer and, therefore, he must relinquish the benefit conferred on him. The ordinary principle is clear, that if a person gives property by design or by mistake which is not his to give and gives at the same time to the real owner of it other property such real owner cannot take both. The English rule applicable to wills permits the real owner to retain both, subject to his making good the consequent loss to the disappointed legatee (e).

Equitable charge.—The section provides for compensation to the disappointed transferee according to the amount or value of the property attempted to be transferred to him. Hence the rule enunciated in the section is sometimes called the doctrine of compensation. The disappointed transferee may say to the owner that a Court of Equity will not permit him to take away the transferor's property until he allows him the benefit intended for him. The very instrument which gives him the benefit, gives him the benefit burdened with an obligation, and the maxim "qui sentit commodum, sentire debet et onus" applies. Thence arises the doctrine of an equitable charge or right to realize out of the benefit the sum required to make the compensation. But if such property is not of sufficient value to make the compensation, is the estate of the transferor liable to make good the deficiency? The section is silent on the point. It is submitted the answer should be in the affirmative.

The amount of compensation to which the disappointed transferee is entitled.—The disappointed transferee is entitled to the amount or value of the property attempted to be transferred to him and not the amount or value of the benefit attempted to be conferred on the owner of the property whose property the transferor professes to transfer. The English rule limits compensation to the value of the benefit (f).

Compensation.—An election gives a right to compensation. The compensation provided for the disappointed transferee is not the benefit conferred on the owner of the property but the amount or value of the property attempted to be transferred to him and belonging to the owner, viz., that intended for him. Compensation is only made (1) where the transfer is gratuitous and the transferor has died before the election or otherwise become incapable of making a fresh transfer, (2) where transfer is for consideration. Neither the section nor the illustration refers to interest on the amount of compensation. Being in the nature of damages no interest, it is submitted, would be allowed. The doctrine of election can never be applied unless there is a fund for compensation or free disposable property from which compensation can be made to the disappointed transferee (g).

Election is retrospective.—In case of moveable property this question would not arise, but where the property attempted to be transferred consists of immoveable property, and as a certain amount of time must elapse between the date of the transfer and the date of election, the question arises, in case of election against the instrument, as to whether the value of the property belonging to the real owner is to be taken for the purpose of compensating the disappointed transferee as at the date of the transfer or the date of election to dissent from the transfer. The English rule applied to wills is to adopt the date of the death of the testator, that is to say, to revert to the time of the will and not the date of the election (h). The same rule, it is submitted, would apply to transfers inter vivos. The injustice of proceeding on any other basis is obvious when one reflects that if the liability to elect has been declared, a period is allowed for consideration and determination on the part of the person affected by such liability and the actual election is frequently not made until some date after the instrument. Under the section a period of more than a year is allowed and in case of persons under disability the election is postponed until the disability ceases or some competent authority makes the election.

Belief of transferor.—It is not necessary that the transferor must be under a belief that the property which he is disposing of is not his own. It is immaterial for the purpose of this rule what his belief was (i).

Deriving benefit indirectly.—Under the section a person who derives benefit independently of the transaction and by a separate and distinct course need not elect. It is a principle well recognized in all cases of election that a person taking under a derivative title need not elect (j).

Several benefits.—Where two or more benefits are conferred on the owner of the property professed to be transferred and one of them is expressed to be in lieu of the property transferred, if the owner dissents from the transfer he is not bound to abandon any other benefit conferred upon him by the transaction besides the one conferred upon him expressly in lieu of his property.

Right to information.—A person who has to make an election is entitled to information necessary for the purpose of enabling him to arrive at a decision and is thus entitled to know the precise value of the benefit intended before election (k). Hence a person making an election under a misapprehension of the value (l) or in ignorance of the value is not bound by the election (m). In case of a purdanashin woman there is a stricter adherence to this rule (n).

What constitutes election.—The following rule is laid down in this behalf:—

(1) Acceptance of a benefit by the person on whom it is conferred constitutes an election by him to confirm the transfer. But this is subject to two conditions:

- (a) he must be aware of his duty to elect, and
- (b) there must be proof of knowledge of circumstances which would influence the judgment of a reasonable man in making election or proof of waiver of inquiry into such circumstances.
 - (i) Enjoyment for two years of the benefit by the person on whom it is conferred without doing any act to express dissent raises a presumption of knowledge or waiver.
 - (ii) Such knowledge or waiver may be implied by acts when the person whose property is transferred renders it impossible to place the person interested in the property professed to be transferred in the same condition as if such act had not been done. Hence no person can be put to election unless he has knowledge of both funds or properties and the necessity of electing (o).

Knowledge is not to be imputed as a matter of legal obligation (p). Wilful abstention from inquiry into circumstances aforesaid would amount to acceptance of the benefit (q).

English Law.—The following rules are deducible from the English authorities:—

1. The doctrine of election is not properly a rule of positive law but a rule of practice in equity. The knowledge of it is not therefore to be imputed as a matter of legal obligation (r).

2. Remaining in possession of two estates held under titles not consistent with each other affords no decisive proof of election. So that receipt of rents of both affords no proof of preference (s).

3. A party claiming under an instrument, raising, as he contends, a case of election in equity against a party in possession under a legal right, must make out a clear and satisfactory case to entitle him to displace the legal right (t).

4. To constitute a settled and concluded election there must be, first, clear proof that a person was aware of the nature and extent of his rights and secondly, that having that knowledge, he intended to elect (u).

5. Where possession is referable to either of two inconsistent rights, the acts of a party bound to elect in order to constitute election, must imply a knowledge of the rights and an intention to elect (v).

6. In order to establish a case of election by conduct, it must be shewn that the person bound to elect has full knowledge of his rights and acted with an intention to elect (w).

Forcing the election.—If the party liable to elect does not, within one year after the date of the transfer, signify his intention to confirm or dissent from the transfer, the transferor or his representative may force the election.

Limit of time.—The rule as to time is

- (a) Election must be made within one year after the date of the transfer by the party liable to elect.
- (b) By signifying his intention to confirm or dissent from the transfer to the transferor or his representative.

On failure:

- (1) The transferor or his representative may upon the expiration of a year from the date of the transfer require him to make the election.
- (2) He shall be deemed to have elected to confirm the transfer if within a reasonable time after such requisition as in (1) he fails to comply with it.

Right to enforce is not lost by delay (x).

Election by persons under disability.—A minor or lunatic is a person under disability, and when election has to be made by such a person the time for election is postponed until (1) cessation of disability, or (2) election is made by some competent authority.

Minor.—A minor should elect on attaining majority (y). The powers conferred by section 29 of the Guardian and Wards Act (VIII of 1890) do not include the power to direct a guardian to make an election, but the section in that part of the Act being enabling, it would not prevent the Court from exercising its general jurisdiction in case of evident advantage.

Lunatic.—A lunatic being also a person under disability is not bound to elect until the disability ceases (z). The powers conferred under the Indian Lunacy Act (IV of 1912) do not include the power to direct the committee to make such an election but they do not prevent the exercise of the general jurisdiction of the Court in such a way.

Unsound mind.—Where a person is not found so by inquisition still the rule would operate and the Court would make the election when it was for the advantage of such a person (a).

Court may elect.—In cases of disability the election is not bound to stand over till the disability ceases but the person interested may compel the election. In cases of infants the Court in England makes the election by reference to the Master (b) or when there are sufficient data before it by making the election itself (c).

Within what time should election be made in cases of disability.—The section is silent as to the time within which election should be made by a person after his disability has ceased. It is submitted that the one year time generally given by the Act would apply in such cases so that he would have a year after the disability has ceased. In England, where no time is fixed, a minor was given six months after coming of age to make his election (d).

Cancellation of deed.—In case of election against the instrument the Court will not order the deed to be delivered up for cancellation (e).

Claim of disappointed transferee.—A disappointed transferee is entitled to the value of the property attempted to be transferred to him and not the value of the benefit sought to be conferred by the transferor on the real owner.

Co-owner.—Under English Law, in case of wills it has been held that co-owners may elect separately, the majority having no right to bind the minority (f).

Dealing with both properties.—If a party being bound to elect between two properties, not being called upon to do so, continues in the receipt of rents and profits of both, such receipt affords no proof of preference and so if the other property be under circumstances that it does not yield rent to be received by the party liable to elect, but such party, particularly if with the knowledge and concurrence of the party entitled to call for such election, deal with this property as his own, it would seem that such acts ought to be equally unavailable to prove an actual election for in both cases there is an equal dealing with the two properties and, therefore, an absence of proof of any intention to elect the one and reject the other (g).

Death of transferor.—The death of the transferor will not affect an election made after his death when the real owner elects to confirm the transfer, but if he dissents from it the benefit relinquished by him shall revert to the transferor's representative as if it had not been disposed of, subject to the charge of making good to the disappointed transferee the amount or value of the property attempted to be transferred to him.

Death of transferee.—If a transferee dies before election his representative would be entitled to take the benefit under the transfer for there is nothing so far as the rule is concerned which requires his active part.

Death of owner of property : before election.—There is no provision in the section when a party bound to elect has died before election. It is submitted that no election in that event can be made. In England, where a husband devised the wife's jewels to the wife for life, the remainder to his son, and the wife made no election or to have the jewels as her paraphernalia, it was held that her administrator could not make this claim (h).

Distinguished from this is the case of a son who died before his mother under whose deeds of appointment and will an election had to be made by him, where it was held that as between his estate and the disappointed legatees of his mother's will the latter were entitled to put the son's estate to election or, in other words, require the estate to make good the benefits intended for them by the will (i). In this case the son had left a will the effect of which, under section 33 of the Wills Act, was that his estate was in the same position as if he had survived his mother.

Double portions.—The cases of double portions have no analogy to election. It is true they involve election but they do not depend upon election (j).

Forfeiture.—There is both a forfeiture and compensation involved in the doctrine. In case of dissent by the real owner there is a forfeiture as regards him of the benefit conferred upon him by the instrument and out of the benefit so forfeited compensation is payable to the disappointed transferee.

Power.—The principle has been applied where the first gift is made purporting to be in execution of a power; so that if under a power to appoint children, the donee of the power appoints grandchildren but the children are entitled under the instrument to other property, the grandchildren are entitled to put them to an election. But to this rule, so far as regards appointments a notable exception is taken, viz., that when there is an appointment to an object of the power with directions that the same shall be settled, or upon any trust, or subject to any condition, then the appointment is held to be a valid appointment, and the superadded direction, trust, or condition is void, and not only void, but inoperative to raise any case of election (k).

Reversionary interest.—The liability of a party to be called upon to elect will not be affected by lapse of time so long as his interest in either of the subject-matters or election is reversionary (m).

Undivided moieties.—J. C., being entitled in fee to undivided moieties of two freehold houses and an undivided moiety in a leasehold house, devised by his will "all that freehold messuage tenement or garden," etc., referring to one of the houses only. The other moiety in the other house was devised to his co-owner who was entitled to a moiety in the house devised as aforesaid. Held that the words were a gift of the entirety of the house referred to, and raised a case of election as against the party entitled to the other moiety and who took beneficially under the will (n).

Void disposition.—When one of the dispositions in a will is void the Court will not aid such an attempt at disposition either by the application of the doctrine or election or otherwise (o). The same rule would apply to a deed.

Ss. 35-36

When not put to election.—A person is not put to election :

- (a) When he derives a benefit indirectly and not directly under the transaction.
- (b) When he fulfils two capacities and if under one he takes a benefit he may in another dissent therefrom.
- (c) When a benefit other than the one expressed to be in lieu of the property transferred is conferred upon him by the transaction.

Apportionment.

36. In the absence of a contract or local usage to the contrary, all rents, annuities, pensions, dividends and other periodical payments in the nature of income shall, upon the transfer of the interest of the person entitled to receive such payments, be deemed, as between the transferor and the transferee, to accrue due from day to day, and to be apportionable accordingly, but to be payable on the days appointed for the payment thereof.

Apportionment of periodical payments on determination of interest of person entitled.

Apportionment.—The heading “ apportionment ” under which sections 36 and 37 are grouped has been omitted from the body of the Act published by the Government of India. It appears in the contents.

Moveables.—The section applies on a transfer of property, whether moveable or immoveable, as it forms part of a chapter which has been made applicable to both.

To whom does the rule apply.—The rule applies only as between transferor and transferee. One of the parties to the transaction cannot decline to apportion. The rule is mandatory.

Payment when due and payable.—The payment of the items mentioned in the rule is deemed to accrue from day to day and to be apportionable accordingly, but payable on the days appointed for that purpose and not on the day the apportionment is made.

Extent of the rule.—The right to receive such periodical payments as are mentioned in the rule and not the liability to pay is apportionable (p).

Entitled to receive.—The rule comes into operation on a transfer by act of parties of the interest of the person entitled to receive payments of the description enumerated in the section.

Other periodical payments in the nature of income.—These words also occur in the English Apportionment Act, 1870 (q) which applies to deeds testamentary and inter vivos to rights as well as liabilities (r). The English Courts in construing wills have held that these words do not include partnership profits which are ascertained and payable at the discretion of certain individuals. They must become due at fixed periods and not depend upon the state of the business and the discretion of the managing partner. Such a payment is never apportionable (s).

Deposit for redemption.—On the date of deposit the property is deemed to have been transferred to the mortgagor and he is entitled to the rents from such date (t).

Time limit in apportionment.—The general principle of apportionment of income is to deem that as between the transferor and transferee rents are to accrue due from day to day and to be apportionable accordingly but the payment is to be made on the day appointed for the payment thereof (u). In case of crops, payments have been apportioned by the season (v). There is no warrant for the view taken by the Calcutta High Court that section 36 does not apply to agricultural leases (w).

Exceptions to the rule.—The rule in the section has no application when parties are governed by their contract or there is a law (x) or local usage to the contrary. A stipulation to pay rent of a year's lease at a particular date is a contract to the contrary nor does the rule apply to (y) transfers by operation of law (z) or by or in execution of a decree or order of a Court of competent jurisdiction (a).

Dividend on shares declared subsequent to the date of the purchase.—Ordinarily, in the absence of a contract to the contrary a purchaser is entitled to all dividends declared after the date of his purchase. This general rule may be modified by special stipulation. Where shares are sold, whether by private treaty or by public auction, and it is definitely understood that the shares and not the dividends thereon are the subject of bargain, the purchaser cannot deprive the original owner of his right to the dividend of a period anterior to the sale even though the dividend may have been declared subsequent to the date of the purchase (b). This is contrary to the decision in Black v. Homersham (c) where certain shares were sold by public auction on the 1st of August and the deposit paid. Transfers were signed on the 29th August. The conditions of sale were silent as to dividends. On 24th August a dividend was declared in respect of a period antecedent to the sale by auction. It was held that the dividend belonged to the purchaser on the ground that the completion of the sale had relation back to the time when the contract was made.

Rent paid in advance.—The section has no application to rent paid in advance for no rent can be paid in advance, such a payment being regarded as a loan. The parties may, however, stipulate that the rent shall be paid monthly or quarterly and in advance. It has been held that the Apportionment Act, 1870, does not apply to rents, annuities, dividends and other payments in the nature of income which have accrued due before happening of the event by reason of which it is proposed to apply the Act: the Act, therefore, does not apply to rent payable in advance and the landlord re-entering on breach was entitled to recover the whole amount (d).

The Apportionment Act which provides that rent shall be considered as accruing from day to day does not alter the date on which it becomes due (e).

Garnishee.—Rent cannot, before it is payable, be attached under a garnishee-order as a debt owing or accruing due (f).

Apportionment of annuities given by will.—These are regulated by the Indian Succession Act (g).

The older English Law.—Cases, however, are met with where the strict application of the rule enunciated in the section not being applicable, the Courts have resorted to the English Law as it existed prior to the Statute Law. The English Apportionment Act of 1870 provides that after its passing all rents, annuities and other periodical payments in the nature of income are, unless it is expressly stipulated that no apportionment is to take place, to be considered as like interest on money lent, accruing from day to day, and shall be apportionable in respect of time accordingly. But this Act does not apply in India, nor do any of the earlier English Apportionment Acts. The principle, therefore, applied in such cases has been the original English Law as it stood apart from statute. The older English Law on the subject has been stated by Lord Eldon in Ex-parte Smyth (h). It was applied by the Privy Council where a question arose of an apportionment between the settlors, executors and successive beneficiaries. There under a deed of settlement dated 1913 the question arose whether income derived from rents and shares was apportionable de die in diem, (1) between the estate of the deceased settlor (who had retained a life-interest) and persons beneficially entitled for a period of 13 months after death, and (2) between those persons and persons beneficially entitled after that period. The Judicial Committee held that the income was not so apportionable since an intention to that effect was not expressed clearly and unambiguously in the deed (i). The Madras High Court, on the ground that the section embodies a rule of justice, equity and good conscience, apportioned rent between a lessor and the transferee of his right in execution (j) and between an assignee from the lessee and the lessor of rent accruing due after the date of assignment to him upto the time of transfer of his interest as assignee to a third person (k), and held that an assignee of a tenant for life was entitled to an apportionment of the rent due upto the date of the death of the tenant for life (l). The section applies only to transfers inter vivos and not to cases of devolution of interest on death (m).

Provided that no person on whom the burden of the obligation lies shall be answerable for failure to discharge it in manner provided by this section, unless and until he has had reasonable notice of the severance.

Nothing in this section applies to leases for agricultural purposes unless and until the Local Government by notification in the official Gazette so directs.

B having provided half the purchase-money and C and D one quarter each. E, having notice of this, must pay Rs. 15 to B, Rs. 7½ to C, and Rs. 7½ to D, and must deliver the sheep according to the joint direction of B, C and D.

(b) In the same case, each house in the village being bound to provide ten days' labour each year on a dyke to prevent inundation, E had agreed as a term of his lease to perform this work for A. B, C and D severally require E to perform the ten days' work due on account of the house of each. E is not bound to do more than ten days' work in all, according to such directions as B, C and D may join in giving.

Provided further :

No person shall be liable for failure to discharge such duty unless he has had reasonable notice of the severance.

Exception.—Agricultural leases are not within the above rule.

Exception.—The section has no application

- (1) When there is a contract contrary to that specified in this rule amongst the co-owners. Under section 37 a tenant liable to pay rent need not be consulted, provided his burden does not increase, whereas under section 109 a right is given to the tenant in determination of the rent payable on a transfer.
- (2) To agricultural leases excluded by para 3 of this section.
- (3) To transfers by operation of law or by or in execution of a decree or order of a Court of competent jurisdiction according to section 2 (d) of the present Act.

Severance of benefit of obligation.—As section 36 deals with apportionment of interest by time this section deals with apportionment of benefit of obligation to which a transferee is entitled on disruption of the estate.

Apportionment of obligation.—Section 82 deals with apportionment of obligation.

Moveables.—The section applies to a transfer of property, whether moveable or immoveable.

Notice.—One of the obligations contemplated by this section is the payment of rent by a tenant. There are various provisions of the Act which deal with the liability of a tenant for payment of rent to the transferor. He is not liable unless and until

- (a) under section 37 he has had reasonable notice of the severance,
- (b) under section 50 if he in good faith pays such rent to the person of whom he in good faith held such property,
- (c) under section 109 not having reason to believe that such transfer has been made, pays rent to the lessor.

Notice under (a) must be actual. It need not be in writing. It may be acquired by the agent of the person sought to be charged.

Apportionment prior to the Act.—A sale of a share in a tenure, let out to a tenant in its entirety, does not of itself necessarily effect a severance of the tenure or an apportionment of the rent; but if a purchaser of the share desires to have such a severance, he is entitled to enforce it. If he takes no steps for that purpose, then the tenant is justified in paying the rent to all the parties jointly entitled to it. But if the purchaser desires to effect a severance of the tenure and an apportionment of the rent, he must give the tenant due notice to that effect, and then if the parties cannot agree to an apportionment, the purchaser may sue the tenant for the purpose of having the rent apportioned, making all the other co-sharers parties to the suit (n).

How rent apportioned.—Under section 37 the rent is apportioned in proportion to the value of shares of the transferees provided it can be severed and the severance does not increase the burden of the tenant's obligation. No such proviso has, however, been appended to section 109 dealing with the right of lessor's transferee which provides that the lessor, the transferee and the lessee may determine what proportion of the premium or rent reserved by the lease is payable in respect of the part so transferred, and in case they disagree such determination may be made by any Court having jurisdiction to entertain a suit for possession of the property leased. When the lessor recognizes the right of another in the premises demised the tenants are bound to pay to each of the owners his proportionate share of the rent (o).

Assignee of a lessee.—The title of the assignee of a lessee is complete upon execution and where necessary registration of the deed. On completion he becomes entitled to claim rent. The tenant is discharged on proof of payment to the assignor without notice. If he has paid after notice, actual or constructive, he cannot escape liability merely by proof that the notice he received was from the assignee and not the assignor (p).

Value of his share.—The duty which a person is under an obligation to perform under this section varies on a transfer towards each of the transferees in proportion to the value of his share in the property determined according to the rule laid down in section 45 of this Act.

Enhancement.—One co-sharer cannot enhance the rent of his share, such an enhancement being inconsistent with the continuance of the lease of the entire tenure (q).

Frame of suit for apportionment of rent.—On the principle that creditors could sever their mutual relations and sue their debtors separately for their shares of the debt provided this be done in such a manner as to free the debtor from all further liability to any of them, it has been held that in a suit for apportionment of rent where other parties interested have been made parties to the suit the rent could be apportioned and the apportionment may take place in respect of both the arrears alleged to be due and the future rent (r). In the absence of special agreement between a tenant and co-sharer to pay their rateable proportion of the rent, a suit by one of the co-sharers must be for the entire rent due making his co-sharers defendants if they refuse to join as plaintiffs (s).

Co-sharers.—It is impossible upon principle to distinguish cases where a tenure is severed by different portions of the area being sold to different persons, from those where it is sold to different persons in undivided shares. In all such cases the entirety of the joint interest should be considered as severable at the option of the purchaser (t).

Arrangement for separate payment of rent.—Where, on the consent of all the shareholder landlords a tenant in an undivided property has agreed to pay the different sharers the rent of the tenure in proportion to their respective shares, it is not open to him to cease from paying the proportionate fraction of the rent due in accordance with his agreement, except on the consent of the owner of that particular share (u).

Liability of tenant acquiescing in arrangement for separate payment.—Where co-sharers in an undivided property acquiesce in a decision declaring one of their number the owner of a recognized share in such property, it is not open to a tenant (who had previously agreed to pay his rent in accordance with the shares of the respective part-owners) to refuse payment of the proportionate share of the rent claimed by such co-sharer as the owner of the recognized share, simply on the ground that he had never before paid rent so proportioned to such co-sharer (v).

(B) Transfer of Immoveable Property.

38. Where any person, authorized only under circumstances in their nature variable to dispose of immoveable property, transfers such property for consideration, alleging the existence of such circumstances, they shall, as between the transferee on the one part and the transferor and other persons (if any) affected by the transfer on the other part, be deemed to have existed, if the transferee, after using reasonable care to ascertain the existence of such circumstances, has acted in good faith.

Transfer by person authorized only under certain circumstances to transfer.

Illustration.

A, a Hindu widow, whose husband has left collateral heirs alleging that the property held by her as such is insufficient for her maintenance, agrees, for purposes neither religious nor charitable, to sell a field, part of such property, to B. B satisfies himself by reasonable enquiry that the income of the property is insufficient for A's maintenance, and that the sale of the field is necessary, and, acting in good faith, buys the field from A. As between B on the one part and A and the collateral heirs on the other part, a necessity for the sale shall be deemed to have existed.

Limited owners.—The statutory provision contained in this section is substantially a statement of the principles deducible from the cases on this point. But this principle obviously has no application where the transaction is still incomplete; the essential basis of the rule is an actual transfer for consideration (w). The section deals with the qualified power of disposition possessed by persons whose rights of alienation vary with circumstances which in their turn are variable. It enacts a rule of presumption as to existence of circumstances between the transferor and transferee and other persons affected by the transfer and protects the transferee against impeachment of such alienation if after using reasonable care to ascertain the existence of such circumstances he has acted in good faith. The opening words of the section refer to persons having a limited power of alienation dealt with in section 7.

Other persons.—These are, besides the transferor, persons who would be interested in impeaching the alienation, as the illustration shows. If such a person is a consenting party to the alienation he would, under section 115 of the Evidence Act, 1872, be estopped from disputing the validity of the alienation and on that ground no inquiry as required by the section would be necessary (x).

(x) Sarat Chandra Dey v. Gopal Chunder Laha (1893) 20 Cal. 296, 19 I. A. 203.

Rights acquired by the transferee.—A mortgage of the joint family property of a Mitakshara family by its karta, unless necessity or antecedent debt is proved, is void; the transaction itself gives to the mortgagee no rights against the karta's interest in the joint family (y). There is, however, a Calcutta case (z) discussed by the Judicial Committee in Narain Prasad v. Sarnam Singh (a) where a charge was created on the shares of the persons making the representation that they had power to alienate although there was very little evidence of such representation, their Lordships observing that that was not the general law. Where the mortgage is for a larger amount than the necessity warrants, it will only be upheld to the extent of the necessity proved (b).

Does an order of the Court discharge a transferee.—It is not uncommon to obtain orders from the Court when a transfer is made by a limited owner authorizing him to do so. Such orders, however, do not discharge transferees from their liabilities under the section.

Gifts.—The section has no application to voluntary transfers, as consideration is an essential element.

Transferor's liabilities.—See further as to seller's liabilities, section 55 (1), sub-clause (a) and section 55 (2), and as to a mortgagor's liabilities, section 65 (a) of this Act.

39. Where a third person has a right to receive maintenance or a provision for advancement or marriage from the profits of immoveable property, and such property is transferred, the right may be enforced against the transferee, if he has notice thereof or if the transfer is gratuitous; but not against a transferee for consideration and without notice of the right, nor against such property in his hands.

Transfer where third person is entitled to maintenance.

The section.—The section is enacted to protect, on a transfer of immoveable property, the right of a third person (other than the transferor and transferee) entitled to receive out of the profits of such property—

- (1) Maintenance, or
- (2) Advancement, or
- (3) Marriage expenses.

The transferee with notice of the right takes subject to these liabilities and so does a gratuitous transferee.

But neither a transferee for value without notice nor such property in his hands is liable.

The right may be created by act of parties or by law. Only three items are protected, namely, maintenance, advancement and marriage expenses.

The old and the amended sections.—The decisive factor, under the new section, is the transferee's knowledge of the right of the third person, while under the old section it was his knowledge of intention on the part of the transferor to defeat the right of such third person. As the section originally stood, proof of intention on the part of the transferor and notice of intention of the transferee were necessary (c).

In actual practice it was difficult to adduce proof of intention (d). As it was thought desirable to protect persons, entitled to benefit of items mentioned in the section from improvident holders of property, the reference to the transferor's intention has been omitted and the section amended accordingly. The words "with the intention of defeating such right" have been omitted and for the words "of such intention" the word "thereof" has been substituted. The illustration to the old section was not explanatory of the section and, therefore, omitted.

Illustrations are no part of the section but they are helpful in the working and application of the statute (e). Under the old section, if the intention of the transferor was in defeasance of the right of the third person entitled to the profits of the immoveable property for maintenance, advancement or marriage, the transferee was liable, on proof of such intention, to the enforcement of such right of the third person. The amendment has dispensed with the proof of intention; consequently the intention of the transferor is immaterial and if the transferee could be fastened with notice of the third person's right he would be liable. To a gratuitous transferee the amendment has made no difference. His liability remains unchanged.

Maintenance.—Maintenance to operate as a bar to transfer of immoveable property must not amount to a personal obligation but must be payable out of the profits of such property. The principal application of this rule is in the case of Hindu females, chief among them being the widow. Her maintenance is not a charge upon the property (f), unless created by deed (g) or made such by a decree of a competent Court (h). A Hindu widow is on the death of her husband entitled to maintenance out of the property of her husband if self-acquired (i) or out of the joint family property if the husband at the time of his death was joint (j). An unchaste widow's rights, while leading an immoral life, are suspended and she forfeits her right of maintenance (k), but can claim a starving maintenance if she reverts to a life of chastity (l). On remarriage the claim to maintenance is lost (m) but not on excommunication (n). Arrears of maintenance within the statutory period (o) would be within the scope of the section. The mother of a coparcener is entitled to have a provision made for her maintenance out of the entire family property (p). Although a Hindu governed by the Bengal school is under only a moral liability to maintain the widow of his deceased son, the liability, when transmitted on his death to his surviving sons, becomes a legal liability, the measure of which, however, is restricted to the amount of the estate to which they have succeeded from their father. The widow has the above right to maintenance although her husband, when sui juris, has been party to a deed invalidly adopting him out of his natural father's family; nor does she forfeit the right by ceasing to reside with her husband's family, otherwise than for unchaste or improper purposes.

The Judicial Committee will not interfere with the amount decreed by the High Court for maintenance unless the Court has proceeded upon inadmissible evidence or upon an erroneous principle (q). When the alienation was the result of debts contracted for a family necessity (r) it will take precedence over the widow's claim to maintenance. Also where the debt was contracted for joint family trading and the purchaser bought the property from the Official Assignee (s). But a charge bona fide created for maintenance takes precedence over the right of a subsequent purchaser of the same properties in execution of a money decree binding on the family (t). The dicta to the contrary of the Allahabad High Court (u) are not supported by any text of Hindu Law. Section 39 of the Transfer of Property Act does not protect a transferee for consideration, when the immoveable property transferred has already been declared by decree of Court subject to a charge in favour of a Hindu widow for her maintenance. The fact that the maintenance claimed accrued due subsequent to the transfer, does not affect the liability of the property transferred to be sold in execution of a decree for the maintenance so claimed (v).

Liability of transferee—where the Act does not apply.—Even before the passing of the Act it was held that a widow could follow the property for her maintenance into the hands of one who takes it as a volunteer with or without notice of her having set up her claim for maintenance but not when the property passes into the hands of a bona fide purchaser without notice (w).

Advancement.—A creature of English Law, its applicability is confined to those to whom the English Law applies. In India as in England, owing to the practice which prevails among Mahomedans and Hindus to make grants and transfers benami, there is no presumption of an intended advancement in favour of a wife (x) or child (y) or mistress (z). "The criterion in these cases is to consider from what source the money comes from which the purchase-money is paid" (a). In case of parties born in India of English parents with permanent residence in India, there is a rebuttable presumption of an intended advancement. The evidence necessary to rebut such a presumption must be adduced by the party contending against the advancement. It is not sufficient to state that he did not intend to confer any beneficial interest on the party claiming as an advancement but he must establish, with reasonable clearness, that he had other and different motives for the action he took and this, whether the person in whose name the property stands, be the wife (b) or child (c). Declarations by the parent, if contemporaneous with the purchase, are admissible to prove such an intention, but declarations subsequent are to be rejected (d).

Marriage expense.—According to Hindu Law, a debt contracted for the marriage of a coparcener in a joint Hindu family is binding on the other coparceners as a debt contracted for a family purpose and, therefore, for the benefit of the family (e). In order to deprive a gratuitous transferee or a transferee with notice of the defence under the section, the right to receive marriage expenses out of profits must be one to which the claimant is entitled by virtue of special provisions of the law. A mere personal obligation will not suffice. Marriage being obligatory amongst the Hindus, expenses incurred, whether for the marriages of males (f) or females (g), are binding on the family properties. The ceremonies of Griha Pravesanam and Ruthusanti are essentially connected with the disposal in marriage of a girl of the Brahmin caste and form a part of the marriage ceremonies (h). Alienation for the first marriage is justified. Every second marriage is not a legal necessity (i).

Notice.—Notice under the section, if constructive, will bind the purchaser. A gratuitous transferee is bound independently of the question of notice. A purchaser with notice is not bound, as has already been seen, if the alienation be for a family necessity or the debts bind the joint family. A transferee for consideration and without notice of the right is protected. In order to succeed in such a defence he must prove both payment and want of notice. The onus is on him (j).

Against such property in his hands.—A purchaser without notice being protected, property in his hands is entitled to the same protection. Consequently a purchaser with notice from a purchaser without notice can take advantage of the want of notice of his intermediate purchaser or purchasers.

Residence.—This right is not treated by the Act but it is submitted that it is analogous to the right of maintenance under this section. Where the sale of ancestral property is necessary in the interest of the family as a whole, then a bona where a third person is entitled to the benefit of an obligation arising out of contract and annexed to the ownership of immoveable property but not amounting to an interest therein or easement thereon, or of obligation annexed to ownership, but not amounting to interest or easement.

such right or obligation may be enforced against a transferee with notice thereof or a gratuitous transferee of the property affected thereby, but not against a transferee for consideration and without notice of the right or obligation, nor against such property in his hands.

Illustration.

A contracts to sell Sultanpur to B. While the contract is still in force he sells Sultanpur to C, who has notice of the contract. B may enforce the contract against C to the same extent as against A.

The section.—The phrases in clause one “independently of any interest” and “or of any easement thereon” and in clause two “but not amounting to an interest therein or easement thereon” should be read as if in parenthesis, to render the meaning of the section more lucid. The words “third person” in paragraph one do not necessarily mean a person who is not a contracting party with the transferor as the illustration shows. Reference may be made to section 6, clauses (c) and (d) of this Act.

Amendment of the section.—The words “in a particular manner of the latter property” at the end of para 1 have been substituted for the words “of the latter property or to compel its enjoyment in a particular manner” by section 12 of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, 1929 (20 of 1929). The reasons for the amendment will be found in notes to section 11 of the present Act. Although an affirmative covenant is not by itself invalid as between a transferor and transferee (section 11), negative or restrictive covenants alone can be specifically enforced against third persons under the first para of this section.

Generally.—The section deals with covenants for the beneficial enjoyment of property unconnected with any interest in that property or with any easement on that property. It is founded on the principle of English Law dealing with the equitable doctrine of burden of a covenant which runs with the land (l). In law, except between landlord and tenant the burden of a covenant never runs with the land though the benefit may (m). The covenant to create a permanent restraint upon the use of the land must not be vague and indefinite (n) and must be sufficiently precise to create a real burden (o). It must be capable of being ascertained with reasonable definiteness (p) and must not be ultra vires (q). A restrictive covenant is construed strictly and not so as to create a wider obligation than is imported by the actual words (r). In India, restrictive covenants based on equitable principles of English Law are dealt with in section 40 of the Transfer of Property Act while covenants at law which run with the land are treated in sections 55(2), 65 and 108(c) of the same Act, as implied covenants. The former cannot be enforced against a transferee for consideration without notice nor against such property in his hands while the latter are not dependent for their enforcement on the question of notice.

Varieties of covenants.—Covenants are of several varieties. Amongst them are covenants affirmative, that something is already performed or shall be performed hereafter, or negative, that the party has not performed or will not perform a certain act. In this section we are concerned with the latter class of covenants (s).

Form of covenants.—A covenant is an agreement between two or more persons in writing whereby some of the parties or one of them agrees with the other or others for the performance or non-performance of some specified duty. A covenant implies a deed (t). The party entering into the covenant is called the covenantor and he with whom it is made the covenantee (u). In practice the purchaser is the covenantor and the vendor the covenantee. Words in the form of an exception may also amount to a covenant (v). Words of recital also may when joined and considered with the rest of the instrument, be the foundation of an action of covenant (w).

Cases in which restrictive covenants are not enforced.—There are certain classes of cases in which restrictive covenants are not enforced. One is where the covenant is personal to the vendor, i.e., where no land is retained to which the benefit of the covenant can attach (x). The other is where there is a total change in the character of the locality (y). So are covenants collateral such as concern some collateral thing and not the thing granted (z) or positive covenants. A covenant to pay one-fourth of the sale price received on the sale of property is not a restrictive covenant but merely a personal obligation of the transferor arising out of the contract (a). There is no such thing between a vendor and purchaser as a covenant to pay money running with the land (b). A covenant for indemnity is not a covenant for title to land and is so remote as not to touch it (c). A covenant that runs with the land is something which restricts the user of the land. A positive covenant never runs with the land either in law or in equity (d). A covenant involving the expenditure of money is affirmative and the Court will not enforce it against the assignee of the covenantor whether such assignee takes with or without notice (e). The above principles do not apply to covenants in leases.

Benefit annexed to the land.—The more modern view is that the right arising out of restrictive covenants entered into by the former owner of the land was, as Sir George Jessel, M. R., considered it, analogous to a negative easement creating a paramount right, in the person entitled to it, over the land to which it relates. That view, taken in Gomm's case (f), stands not only on the great authority of Sir George Jessel but also upon the authority of other recent cases.

Restrictive covenants are sinews of the land.—When the benefit of a restrictive covenant has been once clearly annexed to one piece of land there is presumption that it passes by an assignment of that land and it may be said to run with the land in equity as well as at law without proof of special bargain or representation on the assignment of the land. The covenant in such a case runs with the land because the assignee has purchased something which inhered in or is annexed to the land which he bought. The purchaser's ignorance of the existence of the covenant does not defeat the presumption though it may be rebutted by proof of facts inconsistent with it (g).

Covenant running with the land.—In order to make a covenant run with the land it must in its inception bind the land. It must also affect the nature, quality or value of the land conveyed, independently of collateral circumstances, which latter are sometimes proposed as a test to determine whether a covenant runs with the land or not. It is said to affect the nature when it tends to prevent the disturbance on the surface and thus to preserve the natural state and condition of the land. It affects the value, for example, in the case of land properly drained and let for agricultural purposes. A tenant would be more likely to take it and probably give more for it, if he were assured that compensation would be payable in the event of the drainage system being dislocated by a subsidence (h). It is not sufficient that a covenant is concerning the land; to make it run with the land there must be privity of estate between the contracting parties (i).

Restriction on use of land for the beneficial enjoyment of the property of a third person having no property therein.—On this subject, apart from the question

S. 40 of the equitable doctrine of notice which was brought to a focus in Tulk v. Moxhay(j), which is the leading case on that subject, the authorities clearly lay down that the benefit of a covenant at law imposing restriction on land may run with the land but the burden can never do so, except as between landlord and tenant (k). In equity the burden of a covenant, however, runs with the land. It has never been disputed that the Court has jurisdiction to enforce a contract between the owner of a land and his neighbour purchasing a part of it, that the latter shall either use or abstain from using it in a particular way. In Tulk v. Moxhay (j), a purchaser of land covenanted for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, with the vendor, his heirs, executors and administrators, that the land shall be used as a pleasure garden for the benefit of occupiers of houses in the neighbourhood which belonged to the vendor. Although the character of the neighbourhood had altered and its privacy as a place of residence considerably diminished and the occupiers of the vendor's house had ceased to use the garden, it was held that he was entitled to an injunction against the assignees of the purchaser to restrain them from building upon the land.

In Haywood v. Brunswick Building Society (l), the dictum of Lord Cottenham in Tulk v. Moxhay (m), "If an equity is attached to property by the owner, no one purchasing with notice of that equity can stand in a different situation than the party from whom he purchased" was referred to as laying down the real principle that an equity attaches to the owner of the land.

The result of the cases is that only such a covenant as can be complied with without expenditure of money will be enforced against the assignee on the ground of notice. In Haywood v. Brunswick Building Society (n) the Court in deciding that the assignee of a grantee was not liable on the covenant to repair, refused to apply the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay to affirmative covenants compelling a man to lay out money or to do any other act which may be said to be of an active character. There is not a single case in which it has been held that the burden and benefit of a covenant both run. In order that the benefit may run with the land the covenant must be one which relates to or touches and concerns the land of the covenantee. It was pointed out that the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay (o) was restricted to limited stipulations and could not be extended so as to bind in equity a purchaser taking with notice of a covenant to expend money on repairs or to do something of that kind and that such a covenant did not run with the land as to bind those who acquired it (p). The doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay (q) was considered by Jessel, M. R., to be either an extension in equity of the doctrine of Spencer's case (r), to another line of cases or else an extension in equity of the doctrine of negative easements, such, for instance, as a right to the access of light which prevents the owner of the servient tenement from building so as to obstruct the light. The covenant in Tulk v. Moxhay (q) was affirmative in its terms, but was held by the Court to imply a negative. Where there is a negative covenant, expressed or implied, as, for instance, not to build so as to obstruct a view, or not to use a piece of land otherwise than as a garden, the Court interferes on one or other of the above grounds. This is an equitable doctrine establishing an exception to the rules of Common Law which did not treat such a covenant as running with the land, and it does not matter whether it proceeds on analogy to a covenant running with the land or analogy to an easement (s).

Inter-dependent covenants.—Restrictive covenants treated under para 1 of the section become important when considered with reference to general building schemes or as to how far they bind the covenantor or the covenantee and their assigns. The whole theory of inter-dependent covenants appears to point to an arrangement made once and for all, either on a sale by auction, by conditions of sale stating the covenants and that other persons will enter into similar covenants, and a plan exhibited at the sale, or by a scheme entered into already by an antecedent sale, the particulars of which are stated to the purchaser and which are displayed upon a plan drawn by the purchaser's deed. "To enable an assignee to take the benefit of the restricted covenants there must be something in the deed to define the property for the benefit of which they were entered into" (t). The owners in fee of a residential estate and adjoining lands sold part of the adjoining lands to the defendant's predecessor in title, who entered into covenants with the vendors, their heirs and assigns, restricting their right to build on and use the purchased land. The same vendors afterwards sold the residential estate to the plaintiff's predecessors in title. The conveyance contained no reference to the restricted covenants nor was there any contract or representation that the purchasers were to have the benefit of them. Held, the plaintiffs were not entitled to restrain the defendants from building in contravention of the restricted covenants entered into by their predecessors in title.

The law on the subject has never been stated more clearly than in Renals v. Cowlshaw by Hall, V. C. (u), whose opinion was emphatically confirmed in the Court of Appeal (v) and was also approved and followed in the Queen's Bench Division (w). It was there stated by him that it was well settled that the burden of a covenant entered into by a grantee in fee for himself, his heirs and assigns, although not running with the land at law so as to give a legal remedy against the owner thereof for the time being, is binding upon the owner of it for the time being in equity, having notice thereof. From the cases of Mann v. Stephens (x), Western v. Macdermott (y) and Coles v. Sims (z), it must be considered as determined that anyone, who has acquired land, being one of the several lots laid out for sale as building plots, where the Court is satisfied that it was the intention that each one of the several purchasers should be bound by and should, as against the others, have the benefit of the covenants entered into by each of the purchasers, is entitled to the benefit of the covenant; and that this right, that is, the benefit of the covenant, enures to the assign of the first purchaser, in other words, runs with the land of such purchaser. This right exists not only where several parties execute a mutual deed of covenant but wherever a mutual contract can be sufficiently established. A purchaser may also be entitled to the benefit of a restrictive covenant entered into with his vendor by another or others where his vendor has contracted with him that he shall be the assign of it, that is, have the benefit of the covenant. And such covenant need not be express but may be collected from the transaction of sale or purchase. In considering this, the expressed or otherwise apparent

S. 40 purpose or object of the covenant, in reference to its being intended to be annexed to other property, or to its being only obtained to enable the covenantee more advantageously to deal with his property, is important to be attended to. Whether the purchaser is a purchaser of all the land retained by his vendor when the covenant was entered into, is also important.

To the same effect is Spicer v. Martin (a). There Martin took his lease last of all. There were seven plots altogether conveyed to the superior lessor. They were all subject to restrictive covenants. Each conveyance contained a ground plan showing all seven lots. When the lease was taken by Martin the ground plan containing all the seven lots was exhibited on the lease and Martin was told that all the other six lots had already been leased subject to similar covenants. That was held by the House of Lords to be a sufficient statement of the building scheme.

Farewell, J., in Osborne v. Bradley (b), divided restricted covenants into three classes.

“Negative covenants in conveyances in fee restricting the right of the purchaser to use the land purchased may be considered as falling under three classes: (1) where the covenant is entered into simply for the vendor’s own benefit; (2) where the covenant is for the benefit of the vendor in his capacity of owner of a particular property; and (3) where the covenant is for the benefit of the vendor, in so far as he reserves unsold property, and also for the benefit of other purchasers, as part of what is called a building scheme.” To all three classes the rule enunciated by Lord Cairns in Doherty v. Allman (c) applies—that is to say, where there are negative covenants which are binding on the defendant the Court has, speaking generally, no discretion to consider the balance of convenience or matters of that nature, but is bound to give effect to the contract between the parties, unless the plaintiff seeking to enforce the covenant has by his own conduct, or by that of the persons through whom he claims, become disentitled to sue. Contractual obligations do not disappear as circumstances change, but a person who is entitled to the benefit of a covenant may, by his conduct or omission, put himself in such an altered relation to the person bound by it, as makes it manifestly unjust for him to ask a Court to insist on its enforcement by injunction.

The principle was considered in an elaborate judgment by Parker, J., in Elliston v. Reacher (d). He enunciated the four requisites for enforcing restricted covenants as between different purchasers as under:—

“In my judgment, in order to bring the principles of Renals v. Cowlishaw (e) and Spicer v. Martin (f) into operation, it must be proved (1) that both the plaintiffs and defendants derive title under a common vendor; (2) that previously to selling the lands to which the plaintiffs and defendants are respectively entitled, the vendor laid out his estate, or a defined portion thereof (including the lands purchased by the plaintiffs and defendants respectively) for sale in lots subject to restrictions intended to be imposed on all the lots, and which, though varying in details as to particular lots, are consistent and consistent only with some general scheme of development; (3) that these restrictions were intended by the common vendor to be and were for the benefit of all the lots intended to be sold, whether or not they were also intended to be and were for the benefit of other land retained by the vendor; (4) that both the plaintiff and defendants, or their predecessors in title, purchased their lots from the common vendor upon the footing that the restrictions subject to which the purchases were made were to enure for the benefit of the other lots included in the general scheme whether or not they were also to enure for the benefit of other lands retained by the vendors."

Where these four points are established, the community of interest imports in equity the reciprocity of obligation which is in fact contemplated by each at the time of his own purchase.

The above statement of the law was approved by the Court of Appeal (g).

Power reserved to vendor to vary stipulations.—The liability of a vendor, to whom power was reserved to vary the stipulations, was considered in the case where building land was sold in a number of lots subject to certain conditions as to fencing, repairing the roads, and to restrictions as to the class of houses to be built. The conditions also provided that a statement to this effect should be inserted in the conveyance. By the 15th condition the vendor reserved the right of selling the unsold lands under different arrangements "and either subject to or not subject to the stipulations as to fencing and other stipulations contained in the particulars of the conditions." It was held as to the unsold lot, the vendor was subject to none of the restrictions (h).

For further reference see (i).

Benefit annexed to land dedicated to the public.—The benefit of restrictive covenants relating to the mode of building on an estate through which a road runs can be validly annexed to the site and soil of the road so as to run with it, even after it has been dedicated to the public; but if the road is subsequently taken over by a local authority a successor in title of the original owner of the road ceases to have such an interest in it, as will entitle him to enforce the covenants. The surface of the road is no longer vested in him and the restrictions do not touch or concern such interest in the road as he retains (j).

Covenant "ultra vires."—Where land is acquired under a Special Act the purchaser has no power in law to preclude himself or his successor from the exercise of his statutable power over it.

By a Special Act a railway company were authorized to acquire certain land for the purpose of enlarging their stations "and for other purposes of and connected with their undertaking." Under this power the railway company acquired the land by voluntary agreement and covenanted in their conveyance that they and their assigns would at all times thereafter use the land for a passenger station "and for no other purpose." Afterwards the railway company contracted to sell part of the land that they did not require, and the purchaser required the covenant to be released. Following the principle of Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Oswald (k), the covenant was held to be ultra vires the railway company and that they could sell free from the restrictions contained in it (l).

Scheme of mutual obligations established by common intention.—There is, however, an alternative ground unaffected by any questions which may be raised on the operation of covenants at law or their operation in equity. Where an owner of land deals with his land on the footing of imposing restrictive obligations on the use of various portions of it as and when he alienates them, for the common benefit of himself (so far as he retains any of the land) and of the various purchasers inter se, a Court of Equity will give effect to this common intention, notwithstanding the absence of mutual covenants, provided that an intention that there should be mutual obligation is sufficiently established (m) and the Court can ascertain with reasonable certainty the geographical area within which the mutual obligations are intended to operate (n). If no such geographical area is ascertained such restriction will be unenforceable (o). It is not necessary to find any express contract by the vendor or the several purchasers; it may be collected or inferred from the nature of the transaction (p). Therefore, if there was or is evidence from which a scheme can be found to exist, it does not fail because it is not to be found in express terms (q). This was the doctrine laid down in Torbay Hotel, Ltd. v. Jenkins (r), following Renals v. Cowlshaw (s) and Reid v. Bickerstaff (t), a question dependent on construction of the covenant itself. It is otherwise where the case is not one in which the benefit of the covenant was intended to be or was annexed to the houses in question so that it would pass to any purchaser from him of any one of the houses, but that the vendor was obtaining a covenant which would be of use to him for the protection of his houses in his own hands to enable him to dispose of them advantageously to anybody with whom he might deal in the future. Where a restrictive covenant had been entered into by a purchaser of land for the protection of the vendor's immediately adjoining land but not so as to annex the benefit of the covenant to that land, the covenant is not enforceable against an assign of the covenantor by the executors of the covenantee if he had disposed of the whole of the adjoining property before his death. It can make no difference even when the executors are persons to whom part of the covenantee's property had previously been assigned without an express assignment of the benefit of the covenant (u).

Common building scheme.—In order to establish the existence of a building scheme there must be definite reciprocal rights and obligations over a defined area. If on a sale of a part of an estate the purchaser covenants with the vendor, his heirs and assigns not to deal with the purchase property in a particular way, a subsequent purchaser from the same vendor of another part of the estate does not take the benefit of the covenant unless he is an express assignee thereof or unless the covenant is expressed to be for the benefit and protection of the particular parcel purchased by the subsequent purchaser. The benefit of a covenant capable of being annexed to land, but not expressed to be so annexed either by the deed containing the covenant or by some subsequent instrument executed by the covenantee, does not pass as an incident of land on a subsequent conveyance (v). Where an estate is vested in a trustee who sells plots for building subject to restrictive covenants, each purchaser has an equity against the other purchaser to compel the observance of the covenants. Such equity may be lost by acquiescence. In a suit to enforce such an equity the trustees are necessary parties and the remaining purchasers ought to be represented on the record (w).

Essentials of a building scheme.—There are three or four cases which at the present time show exactly what is to be found if a scheme is to be inferred. The statement of the law is enunciated in Renals v. Cowlshaw (x) and accepted in Spicer v. Martin (y). After these two cases the same point arose in Rogers v. Hosegood (z), where Collins, L. J., stated :—" These authorities establish the proposition that, when the benefit has been once clearly annexed to one piece of land, it passes by assignment of that land and may be said to run with it." Then in Elliston v. Reacher (a), which is a conspicuous example of " building scheme " cases, Parker, J., laid down the four conditions which had to be fulfilled (b), and in Reid v. Bickerstaff (c), there has been superadded to that a little more, and that is, that there must be a defined area.

Repurchase.—A sold part of an estate to B who entered into restrictive covenants for himself, his heirs and assigns with A, his heirs, executors and administrators, as to buildings on the purchased property ; but A did not enter into any covenants as to the land retained. After this, A sold to other persons, various lots of the parts retained but nothing appeared as to the contents of their conveyances nor was there any evidence that they were informed of the covenants entered into by B. After this, A bought back from B what he had sold to him. Held, that the benefit of B's covenants did not in equity pass to the subsequent purchasers of other parts of the estate from A, and that A after the repurchase could make a title to the repurchased land discharged from the covenants (d).

Sale of estate in lots.—Where a property is put up for sale by a vendor in lots and restrictive covenants are entered into with the vendor by each of the vendees, it is an inference of fact in each case whether the purchasers of the different lots are bound inter se by such covenants. If such was in fact their intention, the Court will enforce those covenants between the different purchasers and their assigns. The mere fact that the vendor did not bind himself expressly to enforce the covenants which he takes for the benefit of the purchasers is not material (e).

Injunction or damages.—Where a breach of a restrictive covenant causes substantial damage the Court has no discretion to award damages in lieu of a mandatory injunction (f). The real truth is that in the enforcement of restrictive covenants an assignee with notice is in the same position as a covenantor (g). That the Court has a wider discretion to award damages in lieu of injunction in respect of breaches of equitable restrictive covenants is contrary to a long chain of authorities (h). An injunction will be granted against a purchaser (i), an occupier (j), a person in possession without title (k), but not against a covenantor who has parted with all his interest and has no control over his assignee who persists in breaking the covenant (l), or against a covenantor who has himself not violated the covenant (m). It has, however, been held (the Court of Appeal expressing no opinion on this point) that the Court has a judicial discretion with regard to granting an injunction to prevent the breach of a restrictive covenant, where there is no privity

- S. 40 of contract between the parties ; and it will not grant an injunction where no damage can be proved by the person seeking to enforce the covenant and the breach is not of a kind to cause any nuisance or annoyance (n).

Who can annex the burden to the land.—It is submitted that a person cannot burden the land before he becomes the legal owner thereof (o). An owner of land, deriving title under a person who has entered into a restrictive covenant concerning the land, which covenant does not run with the land at law, is not bound in equity by the covenant even if he took the land with notice of its existence, if the covenantee is not in possession of or interested in land for the benefit of which the covenant was entered into. In such a case the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay (p) does not apply (q) and the fact of notice is irrelevant.

Enforceability of covenant against assign of covenantor.—The equitable doctrine enabling restrictive covenants to be enforced against assigns with notice ought not to be extended in derogation of the ordinary rights at common law of purchasers and it ought to be applied only where it is sought to enforce the covenant in connection with the enjoyment of land that the covenant was intended to protect. That appears to apply quite as much to a case where the original covenantee retained land at the date of the covenant and he or his successors got rid of the whole of it afterwards, as to a case where the original covenantee either had no land or had no land which he was retaining (r).

By an agreement dated the 26th day of November 1926, defendant No. 1 agreed to sell certain immoveable properties to the plaintiff. On the 22nd December 1926, defendant No. 1 sold the same properties to the respondent by a registered sale deed. The plaintiff filed a suit for specific performance of his agreement. It was held that although under section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, the plaintiff's agreement for sale did not create by itself any interest in or charge on the property, he was entitled under section 27 (b) of the Specific Relief Act, 1877, to enforce the agreement against the respondent, the subsequent transferee of the property. Under the latter section as read with sections 103 and 106 of the Indian Evidence Act, the burden of proof lay upon the later transferee to establish ; (a) the payment of his money, (b) his good faith, and (c) the absence of notice to him of the original contract (s). The case was, however, distinguished from the somewhat analogous provision of the Insolvency Statute, namely, section 55 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, 1909, and section 53 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, 1920 ; under these sections the same Board held that the burden of proof lay on the Official Assignee to prove that a conveyance which he was seeking to set aside thereunder was not made in good faith and for valuable consideration (t). The above view under the Specific Relief Act has been taken in a number of cases, Himatlal v. Vasudev (u), Baburam Bag v. Madhab Chandra Pollay (v), Tirurenkatachariar v.

Venkatachariar (w), Naubat Rai v. Dhaunkal Singh (x), Muhammad Sadik Khan v. Masihan Bibi (y). Their Lordships' attention was drawn to only one decision to a contrary effect, viz., Peerkha Lalkha v. Bapu Kashiba Mali (z), but their Lordships preferred the earlier Bombay decision in Himatlal's case.

Re-entry by covenantor on breach of covenant by his assign.—Can it be, because he has his estate thrown back upon him with a building upon it which ex-hypothesi was erected in breach of the covenant that he is thereby made liable to pull down the buildings so erected, but not by himself? This question was answered in the negative in Powell v. Hemsley (a). There the purchaser of a part of freehold building estate covenanted with the vendor for himself and his assigns to erect no other than private residences. The purchaser granted a building lease with similar covenants. The lessee committed a breach and became bankrupt, his trustee in bankruptcy disclaimed the lease and the purchaser took possession of the land and the offending building. The vendor sold the rest of the estate to the plaintiff with the benefit of the purchaser's covenant. The plaintiff brought an action against the purchaser to compel removal of the building and for damages. It was held that the breach was committed not by the purchaser but by his assigns and that he had not by his conduct rendered himself liable for the violation of the covenant and that the plaintiff was not entitled either in law or in equity to any relief. It was there observed that there was no attempt to assign the benefit of damages for past breaches and therefore it was unnecessary to consider whether it could be done legally or not.

Stranger to the consideration.—Plaintiff and defendant held adjacent plots under agreements for a lease from the Secretary of State for India. They were on identical terms. It was admitted on behalf of the defendant that he having knowledge of the conditions, inserted for the common benefit of a group of lessees taking sites for buildings intended to be contiguous and to form a block, was bound both to the Secretary of State and the lessees of the neighbouring plots, and on whom reciprocally, he, on his part, had a claim for the fulfilment of the like terms by them for his benefit as lessee. It was held that neither the lessee nor his neighbour could be called a stranger to the consideration. Each was equitable assignee of the covenants which the lessor made for his benefit as lessee. Each consequently had an equitable right to enforce against the other the obligation stipulated for in his interest and serving as a part of his inducement to the contract (b).

Defect in title.—A restrictive covenant is a defect in title, entitling the purchaser to be relieved from the contract (c).

Trustee.—Where a contract is made for the benefit and on behalf of a third person, there is an equity in that third person to sue on the contract and the person who has entered into the contract may be treated as a trustee for the person for whose benefit it has been entered into (d).

Obligation annexed to the ownership of immoveable property.—Clause 2 of section 40 deals with the burden of an obligation annexed to the ownership of immoveable property but not amounting to an interest or easement thereon. As the illustration to the section shows, an agreement for sale falls within the purview of

S. 40 this clause. Section 54 states what a contract for sale does not create, while this clause expressly affirms the first intended purchaser's right to enforce the benefit of the obligation of his intended vendor against the second purchaser with notice (e). The second purchaser is, moreover, according to the Specific Relief Act, section 3, a trustee for the first intended purchaser of the land purchased by him. See illustration (g) to that section. Again, section 91 of the Trust Act affirms the same rule as the Specific Relief Act.

This decision may appear to be inconsistent with the result arrived at in Lalchand v. Lakshman (f) and in Kurri Veerareddi v. Kurri Bapireddi (g) from which, if rightly decided, it would appear that the first intended purchaser would have no defence against a suit by his intended vendor for possession although by reason of the statutory provisions above referred to, he has a complete defence against his vendor's assignee, notwithstanding that the latter has no greater knowledge than the vendor possessed.

And where a contract was entered into before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act whereby the parties agreed that in case of any future transfer by one party of the immoveable property mentioned in the contract the transfer was to be made to the other party, although held to be binding on the parties themselves and their representatives, could not be specifically enforced against a bona fide transferee for value without notice of the contract. The Court observed, that whether the principles embodied in section 40 of the Act or the general principles of justice, equity and good conscience applied to the obligation of the representatives, section 27 of the Specific Relief Act must apply and the contract could not be specifically enforced against a transferee for value without notice (h).

Pre-emption.—A contract giving rise to a right of pre-emption clearly falls within the category of clause 2 of section 40 (i). Whether such a contract offends the rule against perpetuities has been much discussed by the Courts of this country. The view of the Allahabad High Court is that an agreement for pre-emption is neither void for uncertainty nor does it offend the rule against perpetuities (j), while the Bombay High Court has said that the rule of perpetuities applies to this class of contracts (k). The Calcutta High Court (l) has also adopted the rule in London South Western Railway Co. v. Gomm (m).

Notice.—A transferee with notice is liable under the section and so is a gratuitous transferee whether with or without notice. In order that the right or obligation under this section may not be enforceable, the transferee's defence must be that he is a transferee for consideration without notice of the right or obligation. Equity favours a transferee for value without notice. Constructive notice would be a bar to such a defence (n). Burden lies upon the transferee to establish (1) payment of money, (2) absence of notice (o), both together constituting a single defence. Notice is not binding when performance of the covenant involves a transferee into expense (p).

Against such property in his hands.—This answers the question whether the land in the hands of a transferee for value without notice is bound so that he can be restrained from using it in a manner contrary to the covenant. The lessee of premises No. 137, High Street, East Ham, carried on therein the business of a pork butcher. The lease contained a covenant by which he covenanted not to carry on therein any noisy or offensive trade other than that of a pork butcher. He was also lessee under a different landlord of premises No. 170 in the same street, upon which he carried on the business of a general butcher. He sold and assigned to the plaintiff his interest in the last mentioned premises and the goodwill of his business as a general butcher, covenanting with the plaintiff (inter alia) that he, his executors, administrators and assigns, would not "cut, sell or deal in fresh hind-quarter beef, mutton, veal, lamb or poultry at or upon the premises No. 137, High Street, East Ham, or in connection with the business of a pork butcher now carried on there by him." He afterwards gave up business and surrendered his lease of No. 137 to the landlord; and a new lease thereof was granted to his son by the landlord, which lease contained a covenant that the lessee would not carry on upon the premises any noisy or offensive trade other than—not "that of a pork butcher," as in the old lease, but—"that of a butcher." At the time when the landlord accepted the surrender, he had not in fact notice of the restrictive covenant entered into by the father with the plaintiff as regards No. 137, but the son, when the new lease was granted to him, knew of the existence of that covenant. The son afterwards set up the business of a general butcher on the premises No. 137, High Street.

Held, that under the circumstances of the case the landlord was not affected with constructive notice of the father's covenant, and, consequently, could grant to the son a lease free from the restriction of that covenant, and that the son therefore could not be restrained at the suit of the plaintiff from carrying on the business of a general butcher at No. 137. That is to say, a purchaser of land from one who has purchased it for value without notice, either actual or constructive, of a restrictive covenant is not bound by the covenant although he himself had notice of it (q). That is, the defendant was entitled to avail himself of those through whom he claimed being purchasers without notice whether he had notice himself or not. The only exception to this rule is that which prevents a trustee buying back trust property which he has sold, or a fraudulent man who has acquired property by fraud saying he sold it to a bona fide purchaser without notice and has got it back again (r).

Judicial sales.—A contract for the sale of immoveable property can be specifically enforced against a purchaser of the same at a sale subsequently held in execution of a decree against the contractor only if the purchaser at the judicial sale bought with notice of the contract. "Judicial sales would be robbed of all their security if vague references to antecedent contracts could be held to invalidate the buyer's title."

Assuming that section 64 of the Code of Civil Procedure has no effect and that section 40 of the Transfer of Property Act has full scope, it is only if the purchaser at the judicial sale bought with notice of the contract that it could be enforced against him (s). The above remarks were made by the Privy Council in a case where the only notice given was by the pleader of an intending purchaser at the auction sale that the debtor had contracted to sell the property to his client which notice the Judicial Committee considered as insufficient to deprive the transferee of the protection afforded by this section.

Conflict between section 64 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, and section 40 of the Transfer of Property Act.—The obligation conferred by this section which is enforceable under an agreement for sale, frequently comes into conflict with a claim enforceable under an attachment restraining private alienation of the attached property under section 64 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The attachment prohibits private alienation while section 40, if given its full scope, gives the transferee a right to enforce the contract. The point arose in a Calcutta case (t) in which it was held that an agreement to sell immoveable property cannot prevail over a subsequent attachment whether before or after judgment and the fair effect of section 64 and O. XXXVIII, r. 10 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, in the events that had happened was that attaching creditors were entitled to have the balance receivable under the agreement by the debtor applied to the payment of their debts. In that case, however, section 55, clause 6, sub-clause (b) of the Transfer of Property Act which entitles a purchaser who has paid a part of the purchase-money to a charge on the property, was not referred to; for as a matter of fact the purchaser in the Calcutta case had paid a sum of Rs. 25,000 odd as purchase-money in advance to the vendor before the attachment was levied. It was, however, observed in that case that it was open to the intended purchaser to compel the transferee at the execution sale to sell the property to him. The same point arose in a Madras case but there the intended purchaser was in advance of the attaching creditor and it was held that the attachment could not prevail against the decree for possession obtained by the purchaser; the distinction between the two cases being, that in the Calcutta case the transfer to the purchaser was by private alienation, while in the Madras case it was a judicial sale. In either case, however, it was observed that it was open to the intended purchaser to enforce his agreement for sale by specific performance. In neither case was it considered that an attachment created a charge on the property (u). In the Madras case property which the first defendant had contracted to sell to the second defendant was attached by the plaintiff in execution of a money decree against the first defendant. After the attachment second defendant sued for specific performance and obtained a decree and possession. He put in a claim to the attached property which was allowed. In a suit brought by the plaintiff to set aside the order, it was held that the proper course was to file a suit under section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act (v).

Where, with the consent, express or implied, of the persons interested in immoveable property, a person is the ostensible owner of such property and transfers the same for consideration, the transfer shall not be voidable on the ground that the transferor was not authorized to make it: provided that the transferee, after taking reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had power to make the transfer, has acted in good faith. S. 41

The section.—In order to obtain the protection afforded by the section it is necessary for the transferee to prove the existence of the following two conditions (w):

- (1) A person is an ostensible owner of immoveable property
 - (a) with the consent, expressed or implied, of the person interested therein;
 - (b) and transfers the same for consideration.
- (2) The transferee, after taking reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had power to make the transfer, has acted in good faith.

Exception.—The section is an exception to the general law that a person cannot convey a better title than he himself has in the property (x).

Scope.—The section is a statutory recognition, followed in India (y), of the principle enumerated by the Judicial Committee in Ram Coomar v. McQueen (z). It is a principle of natural equity that where one man allows another to hold himself out as the owner of an estate and a third person purchases it for value from the apparent owner the man who so allows the other to hold himself out shall not be permitted to recover upon his secret title, unless he can overthrow that of the purchaser by showing either that he had direct notice, or something which amounts to constructive notice of the real title or that there existed circumstances which ought to have put him upon an enquiry that, if prosecuted, would have led to a discovery of it." It is necessary under the section to prove not merely consideration but also good faith and due inquiry (a). It is of the essence of the section that the conduct of the real owner must induce a belief in the transferee that his transferor had power to make the transfer (b).

Fraudulent intention.—Fraudulent intention is by no means necessary to create estoppel. The determining element is not the motive with which the representation has been made nor a state of knowledge of the party making it but the effect of the representation as having caused another to act on the faith of it. An estoppel does not in itself give a cause of action, but it prevents a person from denying a certain state of facts (c).

Non-representatives in interest.—Estoppel is purely personal and will not affect others in so far as they claim a title otherwise than through the person primarily estopped (d).

Extent of consent required.—A recent decision of the Allahabad High Court has held that for the purpose of section 41 not only should the transfer by ostensible

S. 41 owner of the property be with the consent, express or implied, of the real owner, but he must also transfer the same with such consent, express or implied (e), a construction not easy to follow. Independently of other considerations, regarding the clause "with the consent, express or implied," from a grammatical standpoint I should read it as modifying "is" only and not "transfer" also. The former reading gives to the word "transfer" its ordinary and natural meaning; the latter distorts it.

Nature of consent.—The consent, whereby a person becomes an ostensible owner may be either express or implied of the true owner. It must be intelligent and not induced by misapprehension of legal rights (f). It must be free and not caused by the existence of circumstances enumerated in section 14 of the Indian Contract Act (g). It may be implied by omission causing another's belief and action thereon (h). It must be the true cause of the change of position of the other party. The question whether there has been a representation amounting to acquiescence or not is a question of fact (i). In the undermentioned case (j), one of the Judges of a Division Bench held that acquiescence was a question of fact while the other held it to be one of legal inference from facts found. Mere presence is not necessarily equivalent to consent which implies an intelligent concurrence on due consideration. The consent required is a matter not of form but of substance (k). It has been held that the consent mentioned in the section includes a consent based on a mistake (l) which must be brought within the excepted sections 20, 21 and 22 of the Indian Contract Act.

Implied consent.—Consent which is inferred from conduct or course of dealing is implied as opposed to express. Where a Court sees that the rights of one or two innocent parties must be sacrificed, it is entitled to consider whether anything in the conduct of the party who comes into Court and seeks relief has debarred him from asserting his right. The above observations were made where for a long term of years no ostensible act of ownership was exercised by the plaintiff over the house but that on the contrary she allowed her husband's cousin to appear and deal with the house as ostensible owner and in consequence of his conduct the respondents were induced to purchase (m).

Acquiescence is quiescence under such circumstances that assent may be reasonably inferred from it and is no more than an instance of the law of estoppel by words or conduct; in other words, acquiescence does not mean simply an active, intelligent consent but may be implied if a person is content not to oppose irregular acts which he knows are being done (n). The principle applies when one stands by and acquiesces in something that is being done by another, and if in consequence of such acquiescence some injury is caused to some third party, it is provided by the section that it is not open to the person so acquiescing to say that what was done by that other person was not authorized by him (o). Though mere acquiescence is not equivalent to consent yet consent need not be by word and may be by act and if consent can be intimated by conduct as well as by act it is clear that acquiescence may under certain circumstances be taken to be consent (p). Silence cannot operate as an estoppel unless it is shown that the transaction took place in consequence of the omission to protest or of the acquiescence of the party keeping silence. The rule . . . that one who knowing his own title stands by and encourages a purchase of property as another's will not be allowed to dispute the validity of the sale . . . implies a wilful misleading of the purchaser by some breach of duty on the owner's part (q). Mere silence or omission to act does not create estoppel unless there is a duty to speak (r), and although under the said section 14 of the Indian Contract Act it vitiates consent, mere silence as to facts likely to affect the willingness of a person to enter into a contract is not fraud, unless the circumstances of the case are such that regard being had to them it is the duty of the person keeping silence to speak, or unless his silence is, in itself, equivalent to speech (s).

The silence of reversioners when a mortgage is being negotiated cannot operate as an estoppel under section 115 of the Evidence Act, unless it is shown that the taking of the mortgage was in consequence of the omission to protest or of the acquiescence of the reversioners (t). Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee think that when a "stringent equity," to use Lord Hobhouse's expression in the course of the argument in Jiwan Sing v. Misri Lall (u), arising out of an alleged consent by the reversioners is sought to be enforced against them, such consent must be established by positive evidence, that upon an intelligent understanding of the nature of the dealings they concurred in binding their interests; and that such consent should not be inferred from ambiguous acts or be supported by dubious oral testimony (v). On the death of Z, possession of the estate was taken on behalf of S. by the Court of Wards which a year after released the estate to S. The suit was instituted six years after and some months after S. had completed his spendthrift career by being adjudged insolvent. The claimants were women who had husbands who understood business. They were not ignorant of the state of the family and of the descent of the property and of their share in the succession nor of the way in which S. was encumbering the estate and was thus allowed to be the ostensible owner of the property with the implied consent of the claimants (w). Certain properties were given as mahr by defendant No. 1 to defendant No. 2 at the time of their marriage in 1908. This was not evidenced by any writing; and the properties continued as before in the name and possession of defendant No. 1. In 1916, when defendant No. 1's son married the plaintiff, defendant No. 1 and his son gave the properties to the plaintiff under a mahr-nameh. The plaintiff having sued in 1921 to recover possession of the properties, defendant No. 2 advanced the claim that the properties were hers. Held, negating defendant No. 2's claim, that defendant No. 1 having been in possession as ostensible owner of the properties with the implied consent of defendant No. 2, the transfer of 1916 was valid (x).

Attestation as estoppel.—The effect of attestation by a reversioner to a female's alienation was considered by the Madras High Court which held that a presumption was raised when an adult having a tangible interest in the property affected by the

S. 41 deed that his attestation was taken as a proof of his consent to and knowledge of the correctness of the recitals in the deed and it lay upon the person who contended otherwise to prove to the contrary (y).

In Raj Lukhee Debia v. Gokool Chunder Chowdhry (z), the Privy Council refused to affirm that mere attestation imported concurrence (a). Attestation of a deed by itself estops a man from denying nothing whatever excepting that he has witnessed the execution of the deed. It is, of course, possible, as was pointed out by their Lordships in the case of Banga Chandra v. Jagat Kishore (b), that an attestation may take place in circumstances which would show that the witness did in fact know the contents of the document but no such knowledge is to be inferred from the mere fact of attestation (c) unless it can be established by independent evidence that to the signature was attached the express condition that it was intended to convey something more than a mere witnessing of the execution and was meant as involving consent to the transaction. Hence by itself it would neither create an estoppel nor imply consent (d).

Transactions to which the section extends.—The section extends to every “transfer of property” as defined in section 5 of this Act.

Persons interested in immoveable property.—These words mean full owners or the owner (e).

Fiduciary owners.—Persons who by reason of incapacity cannot contract as trustees, guardians and others holding a fiduciary capacity are not within the section.

Minor owners.—The section does not apply where the owners of the property are minors at the date of transfer (f). A minor by reason of inability cannot give consent under the section (g). The guardian is incapable of consenting to apparent ownership of transferor (h). Neither is an infant estopped by the acts and omissions of his mother and natural guardian (i). Nor are the adult members of a Mitakshara joint family, including the father of a minor member, competent to give on behalf of the minor express or implied consent to a transferee of property of the joint family being the ostensible owner of it, so as to enable a purchaser from him to claim the protection of s. 41 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882 (j). But where an infant represents fraudulently or otherwise that he is of age and thereby induces another to enter into a contract with him, then in an action founded on the contract the infant is not estopped from setting up infancy as a bar to the action (k). The onus to prove minority rests on the party who asserts it. Where a deed is executed by a person who alleged himself to be a major at the time of execution, a heavy burden rests upon him or his representatives when they set up the defence of minority (l).

Ostensible owner.—Ostensible owner is a person who is apparently a full and unqualified owner of the property. A mortgagee is not (m). Nor can an assignee of a mortgagee seek protection of the section as his transfer is not by an ostensible owner but by a mortgagee (n). The owner of a property on which charge is created by decree is not an ostensible owner for such a decree reduces his full ownership to a limited ownership (o). Similarly, a mortgagor is not an ostensible owner (p), nor is the purchaser of the equity of redemption (q). Again, permissive possession such as of a licensee or by a person in occupation on condition of doing menial work in the family does not confer any title to convey as ostensible owner (r). In the case of benami transactions as known in India, the ostensible owner is in possession with the implied consent of the real owner so that a transfer by him cannot be objected to by the latter (s). If a property is purchased in the name of benamidar and the indicia of ownership are in his hands, the real owner can impeach an alienation by him on proof that it was made without his acquiescence and the purchaser was aware that he was a benamidar (t). The possession of a manager cannot be treated as sufficient evidence of ostensible ownership with consent, express or implied, of the real proprietor within the meaning of the section (u). A manager of a joint Hindu family consisting of some minors alienated without necessity the ancestral property. The alienee transferred the property to third persons. In a suit by the minors for setting aside the alienation, it was held that the manager was not an ostensible owner of the property within the meaning of the section (v). Neither is a mother an ostensible owner of the property of her minor son, whether Mahomedan (w) or Hindu (x), nor can apparent ownership of transferor be created by consent of a minor's guardian (y). A purchaser, from a member of a joint Hindu family dealing with it as his own property, is not an ostensible owner (z).

A Hindu widow enters into possession of the husband's estate by right and not with any express or implied consent of the reversioners. A transferee from her cannot claim protection under the section (a). A Hindu widow had mutation effected in favour of her cousin who in his turn transferred the property to one B who purchased it bona fide. In a suit by the reversioner it was held that B was not protected by the section as the widow was estopped from questioning the transfer and as the reversioner did not claim under her he could succeed in the suit (b). When a husband who puts his wife in the position of true owner and she deals as such he cannot afterwards rely upon the benami title (c). Where property is owned by male and female members, the latter of whom are purdanashin, the former are not ostensible owners (d). But a sister's claim was negatived when on the death of her mother, her brother Habib took exclusive possession of some immoveable property belonging to the mother and had his name alone entered in the khewat. Some years after in 1896, Habib mortgaged the property, but afterwards redeemed it. In 1908, and again in 1911, Habib mortgaged the property afresh to the son of the former mortgagee but it was not till the mortgagee purchased the property in execution of his decree that Habib's sister, although living in the same place,

S. 41 sued to set aside the mortgage and recover her share by inheritance (e). The position is different in the case of a Hindu family where the manager or the widow has a certain power of alienation. Hence, if a certain property is admittedly joint family property, a purchaser from one of the members of the family dealing with it as his own is not an ostensible owner (f). But where a person has deliberately got the name of another on the record as owner of half of the property, he cannot subsequently plead that he was the real owner of the whole (g). And where a Hindu widow allowed her husband's cousin to appeal and deal with the house as an ostensible owner, in consequence whereof the transferee was induced to purchase, it was held that he was a bona fide purchaser (h). So also where certain properties were given as mahr by defendant No. 1 to defendant No. 2 at the time of their marriage in 1908 but the transaction was not evidenced by any writing and the properties continued as before in the name and possession of defendant No. 1, the latter was regarded as ostensible owner (i).

Voidable.—The transaction is voidable, not void, at the instance of the real owner. It has been construed as not necessarily voidable in its entirety and that the section is applicable to transactions where a part and not the whole is voidable (j), a construction doubted by the Bombay (k) and Allahabad (l) High Courts.

Real owner's remedy against transferee.—A transfer in the circumstances mentioned in the section is not voidable on the ground that the transferor was not authorized to make it. What the section enacts is that a transfer by an ostensible owner where the transferee does not take reasonable care and act in good faith is voidable at the instance of the real owner. An agreement enforceable by law is a contract (m). An agreement which is enforceable by law at the option of one or more parties thereto but not at the option of the other or others is a voidable contract (n). The remedy of the real owner is to sue for rescission of the contract and the Court may order the transferee to pay to the real owner rents and profits, if any, received by him while in possession (o). On adjudging the rescission of a contract the Court may require the party to whom such relief is granted to make any compensation to the other which justice may require (p). Again, section 86 of the Indian Trust Act (II of 1882) enacts that where property is transferred in pursuance of a contract which is liable to rescission or is induced by fraud or mistake the transferee must on receiving notice to that effect hold the property for the benefit of the transferor subject to repayment by the latter of the consideration actually paid. Section 96 of the same Act saves the rights of transferees in good faith for consideration, while section 95 of the same Act declares that the transferee's duties, liabilities and disabilities are similar to those of a trustee of the property for a person for whose benefit he holds it.

Right of real owner against the ostensible owner.—The section is silent as to the real owner's remedy against the ostensible owner. The former may file a declaratory suit under section 42 of the Specific Relief Act, I of 1877, so long as the ostensible owner has not parted with the possession and has not conveyed the property to a purchaser as contemplated by the section. In such a case the Court would order its restoration to the real owner. But in case the property has passed from the hands of the ostensible owner to that of a purchaser of the character as mentioned in the proviso to the section, the real owner's remedy against the ostensible owner would lie in damages. Reference may be made to sections 82 and 95 of the Indian Trust Act, II of 1882.

To make it.—This expression refers to the particular transfer which must include the entirety of the interest purported to be transferred by the transaction (q).

Proviso.—The proviso which is the second condition of the section is to the effect that the transferee from an ostensible owner can defeat the real owner only if, after taking reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had power to make the transfer, he has acted in good faith (r). Reasonable care is such care as a person of ordinary prudence would take in the absence of some specific circumstances which would have been the starting point of an inquiry which might be expected to lead to some result (s). It has been interpreted to mean such care as an ordinary man of business or a person of ordinary prudence would take (t). Each case must depend upon its own particular circumstances (u).

What the section requires is reasonable care not generally with regard to every aspect of the transaction but merely for the purpose of ascertaining that the transferor had power to make the transfer (v). The ordinary standard of diligence is calling for the title-deeds and examining them. If the documents disclosed indicate anything to put the transferee on notice or inquiry leading to the existence of knowledge or any information in the title then the matter might conceivably be otherwise (w). Proof of inquiry by purchaser is an essential condition enjoined before seeking protection under the section (x). When there are certain avenues of inquiry open the transferee who refuses or omits to avail himself of them is not entitled to relief (y). Casual inquiries of irresponsible persons as tenants and neighbours will not protect him (z).

The following remarks of Lindley, L.J., in Bailey v. Barnes (a), indicate what is meant by "reasonable care" in the section. "A purchaser of property is under no legal obligation to investigate his vendor's title. But in dealing with real property, as in other matters of business, regard is had to the usual course of business; and a purchaser who wilfully departs from it in order to avoid acquiring a knowledge of his vendor's title is not allowed to derive any advantage from his wilful ignorance of defects which would have come to his knowledge if he had transacted his business in the ordinary way." A person seeking the protection of the section has to satisfy the fulfilment of two conditions, first, that a particular person was

S. 41 the ostensible owner of the property with the consent, express or implied, of the person who was the real owner or was interested in the immoveable property, and secondly, to establish the further fact that the transferee had taken care to inquire about the power of the transferor before accepting the transfer (b). A person cannot be said to be an ostensible owner with the consent of the true owner within the meaning of the section on the basis of an entry in his favour in a mutation register when the claim to have his name entered in the register had been disputed by the true owner, and the entry was made because he was in possession at the time, which facts the transferee could have discovered by inquiries made (c). In such cases revenue records are no evidence of title (d). Mere inspection of khewat is not sufficient inquiry in the case of an auction purchaser when the judgment debtor is a Mahomedan (e). Nor the paper title disclosed in the sale deed, it being the transferee's duty to make inquiries of the defendant in actual possession as to her title (f). It has been held by the Judicial Committee that mutation of names by itself created no proprietary interest (g). Mere verification in the revenue or municipal records that the property was registered in the name of the ostensible owner may not suffice where suspicious circumstances exist to put the purchaser on further enquiry (h). In most cases coming from Mahomedan families, the names of the sisters and mother, who are also heirs of a deceased Mahomedan, are never entered in the khewat. It cannot be held, therefore, that Mahomedan sons, simply because their names alone are down in the khewat, are entitled to give a good title to the transferee and the mother and sisters shall be precluded from claiming their shares (i). Entry in a revenue register is not always enough to induce a person to think that the person whose name is entered was the proprietor and had a right to sell the property which was entered in his name (j). Plaintiff, the owner of a house, went on a pilgrimage, leaving the property in charge of an agent, who had his name entered in the municipal register and thereafter sold the property as his own. It was held that the vendor was not an ostensible owner (k). On a suit by collateral heirs for recovery of possession of the house, a defendant mortgagee not having made proper inquiries as to the mortgagor's title, was held not entitled to protection (l). In case of a coparcenary property standing in the name of the eldest member, a lender making no inquiry, and there being nothing to suggest that representation was made that no other member was in existence, the section will not apply so as to deprive a coparcener of his rights to the property (m).

Where a person in possession of the property mortgaged was recorded as owner and held the title-deeds of the property, a mortgagee from him was protected (n) and so also where the person in possession was not only recorded as owner but had mortgaged the property 20 years ago to the father of the subsequent mortgagee who had satisfied himself that his name was still in the khewat (o). The finding as to absence of reasonable care and good faith is a finding of fact (p). Raking out the old records of the municipality or of the Police Department cannot be regarded as a discharge of the obligation under the section as to come within "reasonable care" and "good faith" (q).

Good faith of transferee.—Transferee's knowledge of the transferor's want of title vitiates the transfer (r). Where a Court finds that the rights of one of two innocent parties must be sacrificed, it is entitled to consider whether anything in the conduct of the party who comes into Court and seeks relief has debarred him from asserting his right (s). Only those persons are entitled to the benefit of the section who have not been able to discover the true owner in spite of inquiries made and who in full belief that the person making the transfer is the real owner take the transfer from him (t). A transfer of immoveable property by an ostensible owner does not pass title to the transferee when he does not make inquiries and is not acting in good faith (u). A party wishing to take advantage of the section must be able to show that he had made an inquiry into the title of the ostensible owner (v). In order to be a bona fide transferee it is not necessary for him to go behind the revenue records and make further inquiry unless circumstances create suspicion about the title (w).

Misconception of a right in law does not render a transferee "bona fide."—The degradation of a daughter under the Hindu Law on account of incontinence does not put an end to her right to inherit the stridhan property of her mother so that a conveyance by the son of such property confers no title on the purchaser who is under a misconception as to the daughter's right, and is therefore not protected by the section (x). No protection will be afforded to a transferee whose title depended on a deed to which the ostensible owner was a party and which amounted to a fraud on the creditor of the real owner. The transferee, being a relative of the vendors, having lands adjoining the lands in suit, took a sale deed within a week of the death of one of the vendors from the benamidar, that is, ostensible owner, he was held not to have proved his own good faith and therefore was disentitled to the protection of the section (y).

Knowledge of family property is a bar to relief.—A creditor who advanced money to the ostensible owner without inquiring into the title was refused protection as it was found that he resided in the same locality as the ostensible owner and had been lending money to the family for a long time and could not therefore claim to be a bona fide transferee (z). But a purchaser from a Hindu wife whose husband misrepresented that the property belonged to her is a transferee in good faith (a). So also an effectual concealment of the real owner's identity caused by misrepresentation would protect the transferee (b). Nor can the true owner recover on his secret title after he has stood by and permitted his undivided brother to sue

S. 41 for possession from the transferee when there was nothing to put the latter on inquiry as to who was the real owner (c), for although a benamidar can sue in his own name for the recovery of immoveable property, it must be held that such a suit was with the consent and approval of the true owner against whom any adverse decision on title would operate as res judicata (d). When there is no evidence to prove that a mortgagee took the mortgage from the ostensible owner after taking reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had power to make the transfer and that he acted in good faith, he cannot claim protection (e). But when there was nothing to put the mortgagee on inquiry as to the real title the principle of the section was applied (f). When during the husband's absence on pilgrimage the wife sold a piece of land which had before her husband's departure been mortgaged by her, the purchaser who paid off the mortgage having by proper inquiries satisfied himself that the wife was owner, it was held that the husband could not recover the land nor was he allowed to redeem the mortgage (g). The duty to make inquiry does not bind a purchaser for value to inquire whether the wife of the alienor is enceinte (h).

Burden of proof.—It is not enough for the party seeking to invalidate a sale to show that proper inquiry was not made. The onus lies on him to prove that there was something to invoke an inquiry and what that inquiry would have revealed (i). It is when the preliminary burden is discharged by the party attempting to invalidate the sale that proper inquiry was not made that the burden shifts on the transferee of proving that he took reasonable care to inquire into the title (j). Proof that a transferee exercised reasonable care and acted in good faith is not enough if the transferor be not the ostensible owner of the immoveable property with the consent, express or implied, of the person interested (k). It is otherwise when there is nothing in the transaction to require the transferee to make a further inquiry as to the real title to the property beyond what appeared from the entries in the revenue records (l).

Auction sale.—Although the language of section 41, Transfer of Property Act, would indicate that it applies to the case of a private transfer alone, it has been taken without deciding the point, that it may be applied also to the case of an auction purchase (m). The Allahabad High Court has held the contrary. According to the definition of section 5 of the Act, there must be some person to convey. In the case of an auction no person conveys. It is, in fact, a transfer by law. Section 41 relates to transfer by ostensible owner, and therefore the case of auction purchaser cannot come under section 41 (n). The view of the Bombay High Court is to the same effect (o).

Revenue sales.—The section does not apply to revenue sales (p).

Civil Procedure Code, section 66, old section 317.—This section lays down the rule that if the property is brought to sale in a Court auction a suit cannot be instituted on the ground that the defendant was only a benamidar for the plaintiff (q). This rule extends to the mortgagee of the purchaser (r). The provisions of section 82 of the Trust Act (II of 1882) do not apply to this section.

Conflict between sections 41 and 52.—Sections 41 and 52 are mutually exclusive. The estoppel arising under section 41 cannot be such as to override the imperative provisions of section 52 (s).

Distinction between section 115 of the Evidence Act (I of 1872) and section 41.—An analysis of the two sections would reveal the obvious distinctions between the application of the ordinary principles of estoppel enunciated in section 115 of the Evidence Act which is a rule of proof and the application of the principles to which effect has been given in this section which is a statutory qualification and restriction of the general law of estoppel contained in the Evidence Act.

Section 41 imposes upon the purchaser of immoveable property the duty of exercising reasonable care and diligence. The Privy Council in Sarat Chunder Dey v. Gopal Chunder Laha (t), while dealing with title as between rival purchasers supported by an estoppel affecting the assignee of the person estopped, observed that the law laid down in section 115 does not differ from the English Law on that subject and the general principles stated in Cairncross v. Lorimer (u). In that case a widow had held benami, from her husband during his life, property as to which he had executed a hibanama in her favour. After his death she mortgaged the property, her son representing her in the transaction. After her death, in a suit between rival purchasers of part of the same property comprised in the hibanama and in the mortgage, the plaintiff derived his title from the son, having purchased his inherited share of the estate, while the defendants relied on a purchaser at a sale in execution of a decree obtained by the mortgagee. Held, that section 115 of the Evidence Act was applicable. The son had represented that the hiba gave a right to his mother to mortgage, and consequently neither he nor his representative in estate could be allowed to deny the truth of this representation, intentionally made on his part, which also had been acted on by the mortgagee; and it made no difference that the son had not had a fraudulent intention. As a result of the estoppel upon the son, any purchaser of the mortgagee's interest, at a sale regularly carried out, would have acquired a valid title to the property although such purchaser might have been fully aware of all the circumstances (v).

Mesne profits.—In Angammal v. Venkata (w), it was held that the purchaser was not entitled to protection under the section, and the plaintiffs were awarded mesne profits at the rate of Rs. 20 per month for three years prior to the plaint and from date of plaint till delivery of possession. Mesne profits can be claimed only against a person who is in actual possession. But a claim for them beyond three years at the date of the suit cannot be sustained as the same would be barred by limitation (x).

Subsequent purchasers.—The section is not limited to purchasers from ostensible owners but includes subsequent purchasers, and it may safely be maintained that even if one of such purchasers had some sort of constructive notice, the defendant who is the last purchaser cannot be dislodged from his position as bona fide purchaser for value without notice without proof of circumstances bringing such notice home to him (y).

Voluntary transfers.—Consideration being an essential element of the section transfers which are without consideration are not within the section.

Involuntary transfer.—The section does not apply to a transfer made in invitum by an order of the Court under which the judgment debtor himself does not join in the actual transfer. Under the section it is the ostensible owner who is the transferor and not somebody else (z).

Fractional interest.—The power to make the transfer by ostensible owner may be limited to a portion of the property, in which event the principle on which the rule is based would be applicable to such part of the property to which the power of transfer does not relate (a). But this has been doubted by the Allahabad High Court (b). Involving as it does the contention whether a Court could split up the contents of a document relating to a transaction regarding immoveable property in order to hold that one part of it was genuine while the other part was benami, Macleod, C.J., while refusing to give effect to such a contention in the circumstances of that case, said, "Benami transactions are generally effected to conceal some fraud, or in order to support some object of a discreditable nature. But though the Courts have in the past recognized that the ostensible owner in a benami transaction can be ordered to restore the property to its original owner, I would not be willing to extend that doctrine and to hold that a transaction can be partly genuine and partly unreal, unless there are very strong reasons for obliging the Court to come to such a conclusion" (c).

Pleadings and issues.—It is not sufficient for a purchaser alleging himself to be a bona fide purchaser for value without notice to plead simply that he is a purchaser for value; he must also go on to show that he is a purchaser for value bona fide and without notice. It is necessary that he must specifically plead that he is a bona fide purchaser for value without notice in his plaint or written statement, as the case may be. If he does not plead all that, he will not be allowed at the hearing to go in evidence on that point (d). In a more recent case, it was held that under the section it was necessary to prove not merely consideration but also good faith and due inquiry. In the absence of such pleadings or issues these questions cannot be raised in second appeal (e).

Second appeal.—The question whether the section can be applied in second appeal on the facts as found by the Courts below as an inference of law has been answered in the affirmative by the Allahabad High Court (f) differing from its previous decision (g). A Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court (h) has, however, differed in opinion. One Judge (Rampini J.) held that the question of acquiescence or waiver is a question of fact and the finding of the lower Appellate Court on such a question is final and cannot be interfered with in second appeal, while Mookerjee, J., held that acquiescence is not a question of fact but of legal inference from facts found and it is open to the appellant in second appeal to invite the High Court to consider whether the question of acquiescence has been properly decided by the lower Court. As remarked by the Judicial Committee, "questions of law and fact are sometimes difficult to disentangle. The proper legal effect of a proved fact is essentially a question of law" (i). As regards construction of a document, the same tribunal has observed that unless there has been a misconstruction of a document which could be treated as contrary to law a mistaken inference from a document is an error not of law but of fact so that the judgment of a lower Appellate Court is not liable to be reversed in second appeal as being contrary to law (j).

Where a person transfers any immoveable property, reserving power to revoke the transfer and subsequently transfers the property for consideration to another transferee, such transfer operates in favour of such transferee (subject to any condition attached to the exercise of the power) as a revocation of the former transfer to the extent of the power.

Transfer by person having authority to revoke former transfer.

Illustration.

A lets a house to B, and reserves power to revoke the lease if, in the opinion of a specified surveyor, B should make a use of it detrimental to its value. Afterwards A, thinking that such a use has been made, lets the house to C. This operates as a revocation of B's lease subject to the opinion of the surveyors as to B's use of the house having been detrimental to its value.

Operation of power.—The section deals with implied revocation of a power to revoke expressly reserved to the transferor on a transfer of immoveable property. So that where a man executes a subsequent transfer to another of the same property for consideration such transfer operates as exercise of such power. The section is founded on 27 Eliz., c. 4, sec. 5. There are no Indian decisions on this subject as Hindus are fettered by the system of joint family property and Mahomedans by the rule of wakf not favouring revocation.

Power of revocation.—A power of revocation may be conferred in an instrument on the executant either by deed or will. It is with the former class with which the section deals. It may be an absolute or a qualified power capable of being exercised with the consent of a third person. Writing is necessary to create the power. It may be reserved by the deed of transfer or by a document of the same date. It may be interlined. To the transferor an exercise of a power of revocation is regaining a lost dominion. The inclusion of it is to be deprecated where settlements are made for the education or advancement of children. It may extend

S. 42 to the whole or a part. The exercise of the power must not be illegal or void or transgress the rule of perpetuity. There are instances in which settlements irrevocable in form have been permitted to be revoked by the Courts on the ground that a power of revocation ought to have been inserted. A settlement made by a father and son contained no power of revocation. Each had a wife and large family and each declared that had he been aware of the effect of the deed he would not have executed it. It was held that under the circumstances the deed must be rectified by adding a power of revocation (k).

By a marriage settlement of the wife's property a general power of appointment by will was given to the wife. On her pre-deceasing her husband without issue and in default of appointment, in trust for the next of kin of the wife excluding the husband. But if the wife survived then, in default of children, in trust for the wife absolutely. The wife contracted debts and there was no possibility of issue. Held, upon the application of the wife, with the approbation of the husband, that the next of kin being mere volunteers the corpus might be applied in payment of debts (l). In order to support a voluntary settlement it must be shown that unusual provisions are brought to the notice of and understood by the settlor. A power of revocation is not essential to the validity of such a settlement. Whether there should be a power of revocation or not must depend upon circumstances, and it cannot be laid down as a general rule that such a deed would be voidable unless it contained a power of revocation (m). The power must be expressly reserved, otherwise the deed would be treated as irrevocable. Nor is a voluntary deed of settlement voidable by the settlor merely because it does not contain a power of revocation (n). But sometimes deeds are found containing a clause of revocation with the consent of a third person. In such a case, creditors cannot assail them.

Leases and mortgages.—As the illustration shows, a power to lease for any number of years would operate as a power of revocation ; so also an unlimited power to mortgage but not a power to charge for a specified amount.

Forcing the revocation.—A creditor may under section 53 of this Act adopt proceedings to set aside a settlement, even though it be expressed as irrevocable, and compel a settlor to revoke the settlement if it be expressed to be revocable. Again, under section 52, clause 2, sub-clause (b) of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, the capacity to exercise and to take proceedings for exercising all such powers in or over or in respect of property as might have been exercised by the insolvent for his own benefit at the commencement of his insolvency or before his discharge, shall comprise the property of the insolvent and would therefore vest in the Official Assignee. Under section 17 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, on the making of an order of adjudication the property of the insolvent, wherever situate, shall vest in the Official Assignee (o). The Official Assignee could compel the exercise of a power of revocation possessed by a debtor for the benefit of the general body of creditors. It is now well settled that where a tenancy for life and ultimate reversion are vested in one and the same person there being intervening interests or limitations, and there is a power of appointment given to that person which might defeat his own interest, then if he becomes bankrupt or assigns his property for the benefit of his creditors, that power is not extinguished but he is not allowed to exercise it so as to defeat the interest of his trustee in bankruptcy or of his assignee. The trustee in bankruptcy could not give his consent without the sanction of the Court of Bankruptcy (p). But where a debtor has a general power of appointment, his trustee in liquidation has no power after his death to appoint the property, the subject of the power (q).

Express revocation.—A trust which is made revocable may be extinguished by express revocation under section 77 of the Trusts Act, II of 1882.

43. Where a person fraudulently or erroneously represents that he is authorized to transfer certain immoveable property and professes to transfer such property for consideration, such transfer shall, at the option of the transferee, operate on any interest which the transferor may acquire in such property at any time during which the contract of transfer subsists.

Transfer by authorized person who subsequently acquires interest in property transferred.

Nothing in this section shall impair the right of transferees in good faith for consideration without notice of the existence of the said option.

Illustration.

A, a Hindu who has separated from his father B, sells to C three fields, X, Y and Z, representing that A is authorized to transfer the same. Of these fields Z does not belong to A, it having been retained by B on the partition; but on B's dying A as heir obtains Z. C not having rescinded the contract of sale, may require A to deliver Z to him.

The section.—There must be an estoppel by

1. Representation.
2. That representation must be fraudulent or erroneous.
3. It must be to the effect that the person making the representation is authorized to transfer certain immoveable property, and
4. Such person must profess to transfer such property for
5. Consideration.

A transfer so made shall, at the option of the transferee in order to feed the estoppel,

- (a) Operate on any interest which the transferor may acquire in such property
- (b) At any time during which the contract of transfer subsists.

Nothing in the section shall impair

The right of transferees

- (i) in good faith
- (ii) for consideration
- (iii) without notice of the existence of the option.

S. 43

Alteration in the section.—By section 13 of Act 20 of 1929, after the word “person” the words “fraudulently or” have been inserted. The word “erroneously” was construed to include all representations, whether tainted with fraud or not (r). To render the meaning clear the section has been altered as above.

Persons claiming under the person estopped.—The section extends to persons claiming under the transferor, for such a person can never be in a better position than he from whom he takes it (s).

Who can set up transferor's fraud.—Not only the transferee but a party claiming through the transferor can contend that the transaction was fraudulent and made with a view to elude a statute (t).

Representatives.—Estoppel binds the transferor and his representatives (u). It enures for the benefit of the transferee and his representative (v) as it works on the interest of the land, and this is supported by the rule of proof enunciated in section 115 of the Indian Evidence Act, I of 1872, which regulates the law on the subject of estoppel in these terms. “When one person has, by his declaration, act or omission intentionally caused or permitted another person to believe a thing to be true and to act upon such belief, neither he nor his representative shall be allowed in any suit or proceeding between himself and such person or his representative to deny the truth of that thing. The section protects a transferee in good faith for consideration without notice of the option conferred by it on the transferee who has acted on the representation.

Reciprocal nature of estoppel.—To constitute a good estoppel both parties must be bound, mutuality being an essential ingredient of the doctrine (w).

Consideration.—This is an essential ingredient for the application of the principle enunciated in the section. The section cannot apply if the deed was without consideration (x). Hence gifts are excluded.

Hindu Law.—The principle of English Law which allows a subsequently acquired interest to feed the estoppel has been held by the Privy Council to apply to Hindu conveyances (y) though there is a contrary dictum of the same tribunal (z).

Personal character of estoppel.—The Common Law doctrine of estoppel is of a very personal nature and only exists between the parties to the transaction. It is part of the law of evidence and is not the same as the equitable doctrine. You cannot found an action on it as you can in equity (a).

Estoppel whether implied.—Estoppels are odious and not to be construed or raised by implication (b).

Duration of estoppel.—Between mortgagor and mortgagee the reconveyance determines it (c). Between lessor and lessee it exists during the endurance of the lease (d).

Moveable property.—The principle of equity enunciated in this section is applicable to moveables (e), as was observed by the Allahabad Court in (f).

Interest feeding the estoppel.—Founded on representation, the doctrine enunciated in the section rests on two cardinal principles. First, there must be an estoppel growing out of representation made by a person who has not in the property the interest which he professes to transfer and, secondly, the subsequent acquisition by him of that interest to feed the estoppel created by the representation. If there be no estoppel, there can be no feeding. Hence there must be a precise, clear and unambiguous statement to create the estoppel and also there must be that subsequently acquired interest which is capable of being engrafted on that representation, otherwise the estoppel must remain unfed. This doctrine seems to have originally risen in the case of lessor and lessee and subsequently extended to various transfers of property. This doctrine is criticized by Sir George Jessel as no longer necessary in law, no longer useful and in his opinion not to be carried further than a Judge is obliged to carry it, being a doctrine by which falsehood is made to have the effect of truth. He further expressed that it could have no operation except in the case of third parties who were innocent of fraud and had become owners for value, there being no reason for preferring one purchaser for value to another; but that as against the man himself or persons claiming without value the purchaser or the mortgagee could recover without any recourse to estoppel at all (g). It is not every representation that will do for an estoppel and it is not every statement that will do. There is no authority for the proposition that an estoppel can be created by covenant. The covenant is an agreement that if the covenantor has not the power to convey, he will be liable in damages. It is not a mere assertion that he has the legal estate but an agreement really that if he has it not, he will pay for it. Even in the case of a recital there is a modern decision to show that it must be a strict recital that the man has a legal estate; nothing less will do (h). Similarly, where a recital was to the effect that a vendor was seised "or otherwise well and sufficiently entitled to the property in question free from encumbrances" it was held that the recital which was an ordinary one and which in substance amounted to a statement that a vendor had an estate either at law or at equity and the fact that it stated, the estate whatever it was, was free from encumbrances, created no estoppel for the purpose of making the legal estate pass (i). A distinction has, however, been made between general and particular recitals. The former does not operate as an estoppel though recital of a particular fact does (j). Again, the doctrine will not apply if there be an estoppel without a subsequently acquired interest to feed it (k). An apparent defect in title is no bar to the feeding

S. 43. provided the other party has believed in the truth of the representation and acted upon it (l). Nor where a deed is void or voidable. Hence, where a person of age makes a lease and has nothing in the premises but they after descend to him, the lease shall inure by way of estoppel; but it is otherwise in the case of an infant, whose deed is never good and can therefore raise no estoppel (m). So also if a contract purports to transfer property which the law makes inalienable, that contract cannot be given effect to with reference to another property which the transferor may subsequently acquire (n).

Where a person has received advantage under a void contract he is bound to make restitution (o). The provisions of the section are not applicable in case of transactions which are void or defeat the provisions of the law (p). Or where the alienation on grounds of public policy is forbidden by law (q). A transfer which is forbidden by law cannot be upheld under the guise of the provisions of section 43. This view of law was pointed out at some length by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the case of Ananda Mohan Roy v. Gour Mohan (r). Again, the doctrine does not apply where an after-acquired title is taken by the grantor under a conveyance made to him as a conduit and for the purpose of vesting the title in a third person (s). This principle of law, which is sometimes referred to as feeding the grant by estoppel, is well established in this country. If a man who has no title whatever to property, grants it by a conveyance, which in form would carry the legal estate, and he subsequently acquires an interest sufficient to satisfy the grant, the estate instantly passes. In such a case there is nothing on which the second grant could operate in prejudice to the first (t). By the English Law of estoppel, where a grantor has purported to grant an interest in land which he did not at that time possess, but subsequently acquires, the benefit of his subsequent acquisition goes automatically to the earlier grantee, or, as it is usually expressed, "feeds the estoppel." By this doctrine the estoppel is derived from the recitals of title contained in the conveyance, and it is these recitals and these only which the grantor has to make good, so that if he subsequently acquires the ownership of the property by some other title, the subsequently acquired interest does not feed the estoppel so as to make the original conveyance effective as against a third party (u). It is material that there must be positive proof of both the grantor's assertion of his interest in land, which he had not at that time possessed, as also that he has subsequently acquired that interest, otherwise there could be no feeding. If there be no such assertion there would be no estoppel to be fed. A by deed purported to grant a freehold estate to B, by way of mortgage, and the deed contained no recitals but there were the usual mortgagor's covenants for title including a covenant that the mortgagor "had power to grant the premises in manner aforesaid." The mortgage was accepted by B on the faith of certain forged title-deeds produced and handed to him by A. At the date of the mortgage A had no legal estate nor any interest whatever in the property. Subsequently, however, A acquired by purchase the legal estate and mortgaged it to C. Held that inasmuch as the mortgage to B contained no precise averment that A was seised of the legal estate, no estoppel had been created in favour of B as against C. (v). In English Law two principles are applied, namely, the Common Law principle of feeding the estoppel based on Doe v. Oliver (w), and the analogous equitable principle, the first mentioned principle being known as estoppel by deed. By the latter principle effect is given to the original contract. The Common Law principle depends solely upon an estoppel by recitals in the first deed and operates only when the recital contains a precise statement of the vendor's title (x). The equitable principle applies only when the first deed amounts to an unambiguous agreement to convey the precise estate which afterwards accrues to the grantor (y), the cardinal distinction between the two being, that one is based on recitals, the other on the words of the grant. The subject is somewhat complicated owing to the intricate distinctions which exist in English Law and the divergence of views expressed by Common Law Judges. Stripped of technicalities, the English Common Law is found in section 43 while the equitable principle in section 18 (a) of the Specific Relief Act, 1877. The main difference between the two sections is that under section 43, at the option of the transferee the benefit of the subsequent acquisition goes automatically to the earlier grantee, while under section 18 (a) it is left to the purchaser or the lessee, as the case may be, to compel the vendor or lessor to convey the subsequently acquired interest. Again, under section 43 two requisites are necessary before the estoppel can be fed. The feeding is dependent upon the option of the transferee and the subsistence of the contract of transfer while no such requisites are necessary under section 18 (a).

No estoppel, no feeding.—This is illustrated by the rule of Hindu Law, where under the Mitakshara a father or manager of a joint Hindu family has no power to alienate except in order to discharge an antecedent debt binding on the estate or on the ground of legal necessity. Even such an alienation is not binding on the share of the alienor (z) unless such share has been acquired by him on partition (a).

Estoppel unfed.—There must be a subsequently acquired interest by the transferor to feed the estoppel created by the section, for the transfer which comes into existence under the section operates at the option of the transferee on any interest which the transferor may acquire in such property and that acquisition of interest must be during the time the contract of transfer subsists, that is to say, unless there is subsequently acquired interest there is nothing to feed the estoppel with. Where a Mahomedan husband mortgaged his wife's property under a power-of-attorney disputed by her, on her death the share acquired by him by inheritance was held to be within the mortgaged security (b). A payment by a mortgagor to a prior encumbrancer would extinguish that mortgage and the rights of subsequent encumbrancers would be determined as if such prior mortgage never existed (c). And

S. 43 where a Hindu wife executed a mortgage of the property of her husband who was presumed to have been dead at the date of the suit brought by the mortgagee, the mortgage was considered to be operative on that date (d). The subsequently acquired interest feeds the estoppel even where the defect in title is apparent, provided the other party has believed in the truth of the representation and acted on it (e).

Nothing to feed the estoppel.—The rule enunciated in the section does not apply if a transferor, who has transferred the property without a title, has not recovered the property, for till then, it cannot be said that any circumstance came into existence which would enable the transferee to claim option under the section (f).

Fraudulently or erroneously.—The representation to operate as an estoppel must be fraudulent or erroneous. It must have been made by the transferor and believed in and acted upon by the transferee. The rule of estoppel is laid down in section 115 of the Evidence Act, 1872, and follows the English Law on the subject of which the general principle is stated in Cairncross v. Lorimer (g). The main question is whether the representation has caused the person to whom it was made to act on the faith of it. The existence of estoppel does not depend on the motive or on the knowledge of the matter on the part of the person making the representation. It is not essential that an intention of the person whose declaration has induced another to act or to abstain from acting should have been fraudulent, or that he should not have been under a mistake or misapprehension (h). Under the section the representation to operate as an estoppel must be fraudulent or erroneous. What the law mainly regards is the position of the person who was induced to act and the principle on which the law and the statute rest is, that it would be most inequitable and unjust to him that if another by a representation made or by conduct amounting to a representation, has induced him to act as he would not otherwise have done, the person who made the representation should be allowed to deny or repudiate the effect of his former statement to the loss and injury of the person who acted on it. There is no ground for the suggestion, that the person making the representation which induces another to act must be influenced by a fraudulent intention, to be found in the earlier cases of Pickard v. Sears (i), Freeman v. Cooke (j), Cornish v. Abington (k), and Carr v. London and North Western Railway Co. (l). A fraudulent intention is by no means necessary to create an estoppel. The determining element is not the motive with which the representation has been made nor the state of knowledge of the party making it, but the effect of the representation as having caused another to act on the faith of it. The section does not apply where the statement relied upon is made to a person who knows the real facts and is not misled by the untrue statement. There can be no estoppel where the truth of the matter is known to both parties. Knowledge of both parties of the truth, negatives the estoppel (m). It is settled law that the language of the section clearly implies that the transferee is ignorant of the facts and accepts and acts upon the fraudulent or erroneous representation and the false profession; and no transferee, who has not been so led thereby, can claim relief under the section. This is in accordance with the law of estoppel (n). The mode of its application is by preventing the transferor from proving the fact that he acquired the property subsequent to the transaction. The rule of estoppel gives a fictitious date to the acquisition of title placing it anterior to the transfer. To obtain the benefit of the section it must be shown that there is an erroneous or fraudulent representation. Whether there was such a representation or not is a question of fact and inference of fact which must be accepted in second appeal. J. and B. purported to mortgage a tank to one K. who brought a suit on the mortgage and purchased the property in execution of their decree and thereafter the plaintiff purchased half the tank from K. The tank originally belonged to S. and a half share descended to A. and the other half to J. and B. As there was, however, no representation to the plaintiff by J. and B. the section did not apply (o). Where an erroneous representation was made by the mother who claimed to be the owner and professed to make the transfer when the property belonged to her sons, section 43 did not apply (p). Where there is no representation, there is no estoppel (q). In order to bring section 43 into operation there must be representation by the transferor believed by the transferee who, relying on the truth of that representation, changed his position to his detriment (r).

A Mahomedan husband under a power-of-attorney in his favour from his wife executed a mortgage of her property. The power was disputed but before the question was decided finally, the wife died and the husband became her heir to the extent of one-fourth, against which it was held, the mortgagee was competent to proceed (s).

A member of an undivided Hindu family, consisting of himself, his adopted son and his uncle, sold, without family necessity, certain land belonging to the family, to the plaintiff, who sued for declaration of title and possession of the land. During the pendency of the suit the undivided uncle died, having made a gift of his property to his daughter-in-law. The gift was held to be invalid and the plaintiff was declared entitled to a moiety of the land sold to him (t). Where two of three co-owners leased the property to the exclusion of the third, who died pending the lease, leaving a will whereby he left one-half of his one-third share to each of the remaining co-owners, the section was applied and the lessee's imperfect title was completed by the subsequent acquisition (u). A mortgage under Mitakshara law of joint family property is void unless it be to pay an antecedent debt or for legal necessity. But where the mortgagor's interest has been separated by partition, it may become available as security for the debt (v). A sale by the father of joint family property purporting to act for himself and his two minor sons and alleging that it was self-acquired property, having been found not binding on the minor

S. 43 sons, it was held that the alienee was entitled to the possession of one-half and not one-third (w). K., a Hindu, had separated from his brother D. He sold to S. the equity of redemption of certain property which was vested in his brother D. under a deed of release and assignment executed by the brothers on partition. D. had disappeared and was not heard of and K. represented by a recital to that effect that he was exclusively entitled to the right of redemption. On the date of sale D. was not known to be dead and it was proved that he died subsequent to the sale by K. and it was held that S. was entitled to the benefit of section 43 (x).

The true rule may accordingly be taken that if a transferor without title has once become entitled to a valid estate in the land the transferee's equity would attach upon it in the hands of all persons claiming under the transferor otherwise than for a legal interest for value without notice (y).

Personal equity.—Closely resembling the rule enacted in this section, though materially differing from it, is the equity affecting the conscience of the transferor. The rule in the section is founded on estoppel arising out of representation but there are cases, in which without representation the conscience of the party transferring the property is charged, where owing to defective or imperfect title the contract remains executory or cannot be carried out to its full extent. The transferor is compelled, out of the subsequently acquired interest, to perfect his title and thus to perform at a subsequent stage what he failed to perform at the time of the contract. This obligation does not arise under this section but flows from the contractual relation between the parties and the case is thus governed by section 18 (a) of the Specific Relief Act.

That a title by estoppel rests upon representation made by the grantor and acted upon by the grantee is well illustrated by the case of a mortgagee of Deshgat Vatan who knew that the property mortgaged to him was land appertaining to an hereditary office and inalienable beyond the lifetime of the incumbent. Subsequent to the mortgage, the estate of the mortgagor was enlarged so as to be alienable in the lifetime of the holder. After the enlargement, the mortgagee claimed to hold the property as if it were an estate similar to that of any owner of private property. It was held that the mortgagee could not allege that he had any title by estoppel, under which any enlarged estate coming to the mortgagor subsequent to the mortgage, would inure to his benefit (z). The above distinction is illustrated by the following case: The defendant having entered into a contract with the plaintiff to purchase his estate, declined to complete the purchase on the ground of fraudulent misrepresentation of title on the part of the plaintiff. Far from the representation being fraudulent, the defendant himself pointed out, by his earliest requisition, that the vendor should procure the concurrence of the heir-at-law, an objection which excluded altogether the notion of fraudulent misrepresentation. The means of curing the defect in the title of the vendor was pointed out by the purchaser himself. On the requisition not being complied with, the defendant affected to rescind the contract with the plaintiff and bought up the interest of the heir-at-law. The right to rescission was denied by the defendant who sued for specific performance which was decreed. It was there observed: " But the Court has even gone so far as to hold that, the conscience of each of the contracting parties being bound by the contract, it will not permit the person who has contracted to sell an estate to which he had no title, and to which, after the contract, by dealing with the actual owner he obtained a good title, to evade his contract. The Court imposes on him the obligation to fulfil the contract, which, at the time he entered into it, he had not the power to fulfil, but which, by his own subsequent acts, he acquires the means of performing. The Court considers that the vendor, having obtained the means of completing the contract, and of conveying to the purchaser what he had contracted to sell, is bound in conscience to fulfil the obligation which he has incurred " (a).

The distinction between section 18 of the Specific Relief Act and the present section is illustrated by the case where a mother who contracted to sell an immoveable property without any legal necessity, not in her personal capacity and not on the representation that the property was her own, but as mother and next friend of her minor son. Both the parties contracted upon the footing that the purchaser would not get a valid title without the sanction of the District Judge. The minor died before the sanction could be obtained, leaving the mother as heir. Holding that the agreement could not be specifically enforced against the mother, it was observed that section 18 of the Specific Relief Act had no application for the mother never contracted to sell any property as if it were her own; she only contracted to sell as guardian of her minor son. No doubt, if she had contracted to sell the property as her own, it not then being hers by inheritance, section 18 of the Specific Relief Act would have assisted the plaintiff; nor could section 43 of the Transfer of Property Act apply, for there was no erroneous representation made by the mother, the true state of affairs having been disclosed to the intending purchaser (b). On the 24th September 1920, S. mortgaged a house to Z & Co. by deposit of title-deeds. Z & Co. similarly mortgaged it to a bank. It was subsequently found that S's title was defective, he having an undivided three-fourth share, the remaining one-fourth having become vested in one J. When S. found that his title was defective he obtained a first charge on the remaining one-fourth by decree which was deposited with Z & Co. Z & Co. by virtue of their mortgage from S. were entitled to the whole interest and the defect in title was made up by S. obtaining a decree and charge as to one-fourth. In this case there was no representation according to the facts of the case. The case was therefore not governed by section 43 but came within the doctrine of personal equity, compelling the transferor to perform what he originally failed to do (c).

The plaintiff in a pre-emption suit, in order to procure funds for the prosecution of his suit, executed a mortgage comprising certain property of which he was the owner and also the property the subject-matter of the suit for pre-emption. The suit for pre-emption was successful. Held that the mortgage took effect as regards the property, the subject-matter of the pre-emption suit, from the time when the plaintiff mortgagor obtained possession by virtue of his decree in the suit (d). And where a Mahomedan executed a hibanama of property of which he had a two-third share, the remaining one-third being owned by his sister, which was subsequently acquired by him, it was held that the wife in whose favour the hibanama was executed acquired a title to the entire property. There the lower Courts considered

S. 43 the case was within the rule laid down in section 43. But when it was pointed out in second appeal that there was no evidence of erroneous representation, the Court considered such a finding unnecessary and supported the decree on the ground that the conveyance of a non-existent property though inoperative as a conveyance, is operative as an executory agreement, which would attach to the property, the moment it was acquired by the grantor and which in equity would transfer the beneficial interest to the vendee, without any new act being done by the vendor to confirm the conveyance (e). A Mahomedan wife executed, of her husband's property, a mortgage on 22nd September 1924. Her husband had disappeared some years prior to the mortgage and it was presumed, under section 108 of the Evidence Act, I of 1872, that he was dead on the 26th October 1926. Still the mortgage was held to be operative (f). In this case there was no representation of any kind by the wife, nor is it conceivable how the transaction was binding on the minor son of the deceased owner. Yet the rule in section 43 was applied. Besides the two equities above discussed there is a third equity supported by a group of cases which do not belong to either of the heads above mentioned. These are cases of mortgagors acquiring interests in the mortgaged property subsequent to the mortgage and which are governed by section 70 of the Transfer of Property Act, whereby the accession to the mortgaged property subsequent to the mortgage inures for the benefit of the mortgagee for the purpose of his security. A on behalf of himself and his four brothers, acquired the shikmi interest in a chuck which at the time was subject to a mokarari lease. A and two of his brothers mortgaged the chuck and subsequently A on behalf of himself and his four brothers acquired the mokarari interest in the chuck. The purchase of mokarari was an accession to the mortgaged property under section 70 of the Transfer of Property Act, and the purchaser of the chuck at the sale in execution of the decree on the mortgage was entitled to three-fifths of the mokarari interest as well as to three-fifths of the shikmi interest (g). Further, in the case of mortgagor and mortgagee three principles have to be borne in mind. One laid down by the present section, the other by section 70 of this Act which deals with accession to the mortgaged properties and the third dealt with in section 18 (a) of the Specific Relief Act, I of 1877. Where a person fraudulently or erroneously represents that he is authorized to transfer certain immoveable property and professes to transfer such property for consideration, such transfer shall operate on the subsequently acquired interest during the subsistence of the contract at the option of the transferee. That is the first principle. A mortgage was executed by a Mahomedan husband of the wife's property under a power-of-attorney from her which she contended was not binding on her. During the pendency of the appeal, the wife died and the husband became her heir of one-fourth. It was further found that he actually received the mortgage-money for his own expenses. It was held that the mortgagee was entitled to proceed against the property to the extent of the share of the wife inherited by the husband (h). Another principle is that every enlargement of the mortgagor's interest in the mortgaged premises prior to redemption usually inures for the benefit of the mortgagee (i). And the same principle would apply where the mortgagor acquiring the mortgaged property attempts to use the mortgage rights as a shield against subsequent mortgages executed by himself. The effect of payment or purchase in such cases is to extinguish the mortgage and the rights of subsequent encumbrancers are determined as if such prior mortgage never existed (j).

The third principle underlies section 18 (a) of the Specific Relief Act, I of 1877, whereby a person, having only an imperfect or defective title contracts to sell or let is required to make good the contract out of the subsequently acquired interest and thus to perfect his title. The same principle would apply to mortgages. The Privy Council has held that the principles of English Law applicable to mortgages in this connection may be applied to Indian mortgages (k). A mortgage by a Ghatwal of certain property which was subject to certain restrictions on his right of alienation at the time of execution, but which were removed afterwards and before the institution of the suit, operated as a conveyance which attached to the property, the moment the restrictions were removed and in equity transferred the beneficial interest to the mortgagee without any act being done by the mortgagor to confirm the mortgage (l). Section 18 (a) of the Specific Relief Act has to be read in connection with section 27, according to which specific performance of a contract may be enforced against (a) either party thereto, (b) any other person claiming under him by a title arising subsequently to the contract except a transferee for value who has paid his money in good faith and without notice of the original contract. It has been held by the Privy Council that the section lays down a general rule that the original contract may be specifically enforced against a subsequent transferee but allows an exception to that general rule, not to the transferor, but to the transferee, and it is for the latter to establish the circumstances which will allow him to retain the benefit of a transfer which prima facie he had no right to get. Hence an innocent purchase must be not merely asserted but proved (m).

Transfers which defeat the legislature or are opposed to public policy.—An estoppel cannot validate a void transfer. The provisions of this section have no application to transactions forbidden by law or are of such a nature that if permitted would defeat the provisions of any law (n) or which the Court regards as opposed to public policy or as would defeat the plain provisions of the Legislature. There is an essential difference between restrictions on transfers imposed by the Legislature and those imposed by a grant or by a Court or decree. The general policy of law is to promote free alienation but there are cases in which, for the protection of particular interests, it is expedient to fetter the privilege of free alienation. In such cases the prohibition against transfer being founded upon consideration of public interest, must be treated as absolute (o). An alienation prohibited and illegal at the date it was made, cannot be rendered valid by subsequent removal of the prohibition. No equities arise out of a transaction which is prohibited on grounds of public policy. The section cannot be applied to make a transfer valid which on the date on which it was made was prohibited by statute. The alienation of a service inam is void and though it is subsequently enfranchised, the alienee cannot invoke the aid of section 43 of the Transfer of Property Act (p). It has been observed that a contract which is void ab initio cannot be validated by the provisions of this section (q). The transfers of expectancies are void in India as forbidden by section 6 (a) of the present Act and section 23 of the Contract Act. Therefore a contract by a Hindu to sell immovable property to which he is the then nearest reversionary heir expectant upon the death of a widow in possession and to transfer it upon possession accruing to him, is void. To such class of cases as are opposed to statute law, the section is inapplicable (r). But in the case of reversioners, a distinction is made between the transfer of a reversionary and a transfer by the reversioner as if it were an absolute interest. Transfers of the former class would obviously fall within the purview of section 6 (a) and would be void ab initio, while those of the latter class would be regulated by section 43 of the Act. In the illustration to the section, A clearly has at the date of the transfer no more than a reversionary right of succession in the property he professed to transfer, on the erroneous representation that he was authorized to transfer it. Notwithstanding this initial difficulty in the title, when the succession opens and A becomes the owner of the property, C, the transferee, obtains under the section an indefeasible right to it in fulfilment of the original contract of transfer. Hence where a person purports to transfer property in præsenti but in which he has only a reversionary interest at the date of the transfer, the transaction is valid. Where a Mahomedan borrowed on a property which belonged exclusively to his mother in which he had only a spes successionis, on the false representation that the property belonged to him, it was held that on the death of the mother prior to the institution of the suit, when the defendant succeeded to the property, the present section applied (s). The same view was taken by the Madras High Court where a Mahomedan who had only a spes successionis in his father's property mortgaged it upon an express declaration that he had a title in præsenti in it. During the progress of the suit to enforce the mortgage, the mortgagor's father died and he became the owner by succession. His defence under section 6 (a) failed and it was held that section 43 applied (t). A purchaser of property from the holder of a service inam who is prohibited by law from alienating the property cannot claim a valid title thereto on the ground that the inam has since been enfranchised and a patta has been issued to the alienor. The section can have no operation when the alienation is forbidden by law on grounds of public policy (u). A mortgage, executed by a mortgagor, who was at the time a person disqualified under section 8 of the Jhansi Encumbered Estates Act of 1882, is a contract for an unlawful consideration within section 23 of the Indian Contract Act, so that the present section 43 could not be brought to aid such a transaction (v). Possession obtained through a transaction which the law prohibits and declares to be void is adverse. It is just such possession originating without colour of title which is contemplated by the law of limitation (w).

Operation of the transfer.—In order that a subsequently acquired interest may attach itself to the transfer made by the transferor under a fraudulent or erroneous representation, three requisites are necessary. It can only be (1) at the option of the transferee, and (2) during the time the contract of transfer subsists, and (3) a transferee in good faith for consideration without notice of the option not intervening. A contract can no longer be deemed to subsist when a transferee has obtained a decree for specific performance or damages following on a rescission of the contract. Even a mere rescission of the contract by the transferee would determine the contract. The words of the section are wide enough to include the case of a contract merged in a decree. A Mahomedan woman with her eldest son executed a mortgage of an estate in which her younger children were entitled to shares. The mortgagee obtained a decree against the co-mortgagors and the suit was otherwise dismissed. Subsequently, the shares of the co-mortgagors were increased by inheritance from one of the other defendants who died before the decree was executed. In rendering the increased shares of the mortgagors liable to be sold in execution of the decree, it was said that the words of section 43, "at any time during which the contract of transfer subsists" were wide enough to cover the present case, for although the contract had merged in the decree, it must be held to subsist till the mortgage was satisfied and the mere fact of the share in question having devolved on respondent subsequent to the decree appeared to be no reason for holding section 43 inapplicable (x). And so where a portion of the property comprised in a mortgage was acquired by the mortgagor subsequent to the mortgagee's decree, the latter was held entitled to execute the decree against the mortgagor's interest acquired on partition (y).

Option of the transferee.—The subsequently acquired interest referred to in the section does not automatically attach to the previous interest but the transferee can obtain it, if he chooses to do so. It rests upon his option and it is for him to exercise that option. Such option, however, can only be exercised during the time the contract of transfer subsists.

Estoppel fed automatically.—That at the option of the transferee the transfer operates on the subsequently acquired interest automatically without a deed, is indicated by the illustration to the section where the word "deliver" is used. Under section 54, the mode of transfer by delivery is restricted to tangible immoveable property of a value less than Rs. 100, and in the case of property of the value of Rs. 100 and upwards, it is necessary for the parties to resort to a registered instrument. This distinction is not made by the present section.

Contract of transfer.—Under the section the transferor by false or erroneous representation professes to transfer certain immoveable property to the transferee which is not the whole of his stipulated interest. Consequently the contract of sale cannot be considered to have been fully executed, and hence the phrase "contract of transfer" is used in the section in spite of the transfer having been made and before the acquisition of the subsequently acquired interest, for the transfer has not taken place according to the settled terms between the parties. According to section 54

S. 43 of the Act, "a contract for sale of immoveable property is a contract that a sale of such property shall take place on terms settled between the parties." This leads to the distinction made in English Law of discharge of a contract executory and executed. It is competent for both parties to an executory contract, by mutual agreement, without any satisfaction to discharge the obligation of that contract. But an executed contract cannot be discharged except by a release under seal, or by performance of the obligation, as by payment, where the obligation is to be performed by payment (z).

Proviso.—The option reserved to the transferee under the section is liable to be defeated by a subsequent transferee in good faith for consideration without notice of the existence of the option, but the absence of any of the three necessary requisites here enumerated would defeat the rights of the subsequent transferee (a).

A mortgage was executed on behalf of A. by her husband N. in favour of B in 1877. On A.'s death the property passed to N. and other heirs. In 1886 N. executed a mortgage of his share inherited from A. to C. C. purchased in execution of his mortgage decree the property mortgaged to him and obtained possession in 1892. C. was found not to be a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the share purchased by him. In 1891 B. brought a suit on his mortgage against the mortgagor's heirs and against C. as puisne mortgagee. It was held that before a subsequent purchaser could be bound by the principle of equity which underlies that section, it is necessary to find whether the purchaser was a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. Issue was sent down as no finding of the lower Court was recorded on this point (b).

If a transferor without title has once become entitled to a valid estate in the land, the transferee's equity would attach upon it in the hands of all persons claiming under the transferor otherwise than for a legal interest by purchase for value without notice—the heir inclusive (c). The subsequent transferee's knowledge of the original transfer is immaterial. What is material is that he should have notice of the existence of the original transferee's option to proceed against the transferor (d).

Pleas of "non est factum."—It has been doubted whether the old authorities on the plea of non est factum extend beyond cases where the party is blind or illiterate. These were the observations in a case where it was held that misrepresentation being only as to the contents of a deed known by the defendant to deal with the property, the plea failed (e). In a more recent case the defence of non est factum was, however, allowed to prevail where the defendant's signature was obtained by fraud, he being ignorant of the contents of a document which was represented to him as an insurance paper when in fact it was a guarantee (f).

Lessor and lessee.—As between these, when once the relation is established, if any estate or interest passes from a lessor or his real title is shown upon the face of the lease, there can be no estoppel. If a lessor has no title and the lessee be evicted by title paramount, he may plead that as a defence to an action by the lessor. But so long as a lessee continues in possession under the lease he cannot set up any defence founded upon the fact that the lessor, nil habuit in tenementis and upon the execution of the lease there is, in contemplation of the law, created in the lessor a reversion in fee simple by estoppel which passes by descent to his heir and by purchase to his assignee, who may sue on the covenants in the lease. This was the decision in Cuthbertson v. Irving (g), where Martin B., employing the metaphor feeding the estoppel, observed, "There are some points in the law relating to estoppels which seem clear. First, when a lessor without any legal estate or title demises, to another, the parties themselves are estopped from disputing the validity of the lease on that ground; in other words, a tenant cannot deny his landlord's title, nor can the lessor dispute the validity of the lease. Secondly, where a lessor by deed grants a lease without title and subsequently acquires one, the estoppel is said to be fed, and the lease and reversion then take effect in interest and not by estoppel; and an action will lie by the assignee of the reversion against the tenants on the covenants in the lease, Webb v. Austin (h), and by the tenant against the assignee of the reversion, Sturgeon v. Wingfield (i)." It has been held that when a lessor is by his recital shewn to have a specific estate and the Court finds that the parties proceeded upon the assumption that such an estate was to pass, an estate by estoppel is created between the parties and those claiming under them in respect of any after-acquired interest of the grantor, the newly acquired title being said to feed the estoppel. The principle is not inapplicable to a case where there was originally no title at all and is not confined in its application to cases where there is an enlargement of an existing interest (j).

Mortgagor and mortgagee.—The principle of the section also applies as between mortgagor and mortgagee. T. and D. sued DD. for recovery of certain property. The suit was decreed and the defendant appealed. The plaintiff mortgaged 8 biswa share in village U. which was part of the property in dispute to W. By compromise each of the parties got half of the property mortgaged and it was further provided that DD. should pay the debt due to W. W., having sold his rights as mortgagee, the purchaser sued on the mortgage. The Court held that the mortgage was enforceable only against 4 biswa share of the village which was still held by T. and D. No party who has made a transfer to another is entitled to say that the transferee has no right to the property. This principle has been stretched so far as to enact a rule of law in the present section, where, a person without owning a property purports to transfer it, he would be bound to make good the transfer, if later he acquires the property (k).

No title.—Both section 43 of the Transfer of Property Act and section 18 (a) of the Specific Relief Act, I of 1877, apply to cases where there is no title at all and are not confined in their application to cases where there is an enlargement of an existing interest. A conveyance of a non-existent property though inoperative, as a conveyance, is operative as an executory agreement, which would attach to the property the moment it is acquired by the grantor and which in equity would transfer the beneficial interest to the purchaser without any new act being done by the vendor to confirm the conveyance (l). The equitable principle is expressed in the dictum of Lord Westbury in Holroyd v. Marshall (m), that if a vendor or mortgagor agrees to sell or mortgage property of which he is not possessed at the time and he receives consideration for the contract and afterwards becomes possessed of the property, answering the description in the contract, a Court of Equity would compel him to perform the contract and the Court would in equity transfer the beneficial interest to the mortgagee or purchaser immediately on the property being acquired.

Court sales.—The case of an execution sale, however, stands on an obviously different footing. The decree-holder does not guarantee the title of the judgment-debtor; the intending purchaser knows that under the law he can acquire nothing beyond the right title and interest of the judgment-debtor (n).

Third Schedule, paragraph 11 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1908.—A transfer made in contravention of the provisions of this paragraph is void and of no legal effect whatever. Section 43 does not apply to such a transfer (o).

Inquiry and reasonable care.—These elements, necessary under section 41, are not essential under the present section (p).

Exchange.—The section applies to an exchange of immoveable property which stands on the same footing as a sale. A exchanged his property with B's. At the time of the exchange B had only a half share in the property but subsequently acquired the other half by purchase. It was held that as soon as B's title was perfected, the benefit accrued to A (q). For right of party deprived of the thing received in exchange, see section 119 of the Act.

Official Receiver.—A purchaser from the Official Receiver, when the property of the insolvent did not vest in him, can claim the benefit of the section when the property vests in him. The subsequent vesting order makes the sale valid. It is not sale in execution of a decree or by order of the Court so as to attract the advantages and the infirmities attending Court sales (r).

Insolvency.—Property, which had devolved upon the insolvent after adjudication and before discharge but not claimed by the receiver, was held to attract the application of the section so as to entitle the mortgagee to enforce his mortgage executed between the dates of adjudication and discharge (s).

44. Where one of two or more co-owners of immoveable property legally competent in that behalf, transfers his share of such property or any interest therein, the transferee acquires, as to such share or interest, and so far as is necessary to give effect to the transfer, the transferor's right to joint possession or other common or part enjoyment of the property, and to enforce a partition of the same, but subject to the conditions and liabilities affecting, at the date of the transfer, the share or interest so transferred.

Where the transferee of a share of a dwelling-house belonging to an undivided family is not a member of the family, nothing in this section shall be deemed to entitle him to joint possession or other common or part enjoyment of the house.

Transferee's rights and obligations.—Under the section, on a transfer by a co-owner of a share in immoveable property or of any interest therein, the transferee's rights are :—

(1) To joint possession or other common or part enjoyment of the property with the other co-owner or co-owners.

(2) To enforce a partition of the same.

His obligations are that he is subject

(1) To conditions and

(2) Liabilities affecting the share or interest at the date of the transfer.

Transferee.—Includes a mortgagee (t) as well as a lessee (u), but clause 2 excludes a person who is not a member of the family, so that a stranger cannot take the benefit of clause 1 where the share transferred is that of a dwelling-house (v).

The only remedy of such a transferee is to seek a partition and not to force his way into the family dwelling-house. It is therefore necessary for a Court when a suit is instituted by a stranger to an undivided family for a partition of a dwelling-house to find first whether the house in question was a dwelling-house and belongs to an undivided family (w). It is only to the dwelling-house belonging to the undivided family and not to every house that the restriction in clause 2 applies.

Transferee's right under clause 1.—The purchaser from a member of an undivided Hindu family of that member's share in a specific portion of the ancestral family property cannot sue for a partition of that portion alone and obtain allotment to himself by metes and bounds of his vendor's share in that portion of the property; for a suit for partial partition of an undivided family property will not lie. The transferee of a coparcener's share can take no higher right than his vendor possesses, and that is not a right to a certain share in each particular item of the family property but a joint right with the other coparceners to the ownership and enjoyment of each individual item with an incidental right to obtain a partition of the whole family property and have his share made over to him after due provision for family debts and liabilities (x). The rights of such purchaser are not extended by section 44 of the Transfer of Property Act which only gives him "the transferor's right to joint possession or other common or part enjoyment of the property and to enforce a partition of the same."

Liabilities affecting the transferee.—The purchaser of an undivided share of a Hindu coparcener gets only an equity to enforce partition and takes the share when partitioned subject to all liabilities on it in the hands of his vendor (y).

At the date of the transfer.—The transferee of a co-sharer cannot be liable for the negligence or misdeeds of his transferor or legal representative subsequent to alienation nor can he be liable for acts of waste done by the legal representative of the transferor or his omission to do necessary repairs after the date of the institution of the suit for partition (z).

Share of a dwelling-house.—Both under this Act as well as the Partition Act (a), the share of the dwelling-house in question must belong to an undivided family. On a partition "dwelling-house" would generally mean not only the house itself but also the land and appurtenances which were ordinarily and reasonably required for its enjoyment (b). Section 4 of the Partition Act has been held to apply to the rest of a house, portion of which was separated owing to one member selling his interest in it (c).

Mode of division.—Where the mode of division is found inexpedient, section 2 of the Partition Act gives the Court power to order sale (d).

Undivided family.—This phrase applies to a family divided in status and is not restricted to what is ordinarily known as a joint Hindu family. It is an expression of general application, and means a family, whether Hindu, Mahomedan, Christian, etc., possessed of a dwelling-house which has not been divided or partitioned among members of the family (e). The words "undivided family" must be taken to mean undivided qua the dwelling-house in question and to be a family which owns the house but has not divided it. There is nothing in the Act to support the suggestion that the words were intended to be used in the narrow and restricted sense as comprising a body of persons who can trace their descent from a common stock. It is the ownership and not its actual occupation which brings the operation of the section into play (f). The requirements of the section are satisfied if it be shewn that the house is an undivided one and the members of the family occasionally reside therein. It is unnecessary to prove that the members of the family constantly resided nor is it necessary that they should be joint in food (g).

Court sale.—Section 44 does not apply to a sale by the Court.

Hindu Law.—The rule enunciated in section 44 does not override the Hindu Law (h).

Transferee from a Hindu coparcener in the Bombay Presidency.—It cannot be said that any coparcener has a particular share in any item of the family property. He has only an undivided share in the whole of it. In Bombay it is settled law that a coparcener can sell his own interest in joint family property provided there is valuable consideration for it (i). Under the Mitakshara as interpreted in the Bombay Presidency a purchaser cannot get joint possession of the share but is only entitled to a declaration of his rights that he has acquired the interest of the vendor and a declaration that he be left to recover that interest by separate suit for partition in which all necessary parties and properties should be joined (j). The relief can only be given by way of a suit for a general partition (k). Joint possession cannot be given to the vendee (l). The sale is valid even though the deed takes the form not of the sale of his interest but of a sale of the whole (m). And where a stranger purchases a particular portion of the joint family property from one of the coparceners in a joint family he is entitled to file a suit against the other members of the family for partition and on partition, if possible, the property which he has purchased as belonging to a certain coparcener should be given to him as his share (n). The Madras High Court has also held that a purchaser of the interest of a coparcener must sue for general partition (o). A contrary view has been taken by the Allahabad High Court (p).

The following propositions were laid down so far as the Presidency of Bombay is concerned with regard to the rights and remedies in the case of a purchase by a stranger of an undivided share in a joint Hindu family in Bhau v. Budha (q).

(1) A stranger-purchaser of the undivided share of a coparcener in a joint Hindu family, if out of possession should not be given joint possession with the other coparceners, but should be left to his remedy of a suit for partition (r).

(2) On the other hand, a coparcener, who has been excluded, may obtain joint possession with such a purchaser who has obtained possession of the joint-family property (s).

(3) The purchaser in possession need not be ejected in a suit for recovery of possession brought by an excluded coparcener but can be declared to be entitled to hold (pending a partition) as a tenant in common with the other coparceners (t).

Allenee of share in a Hindu coparcenary in the Madras Presidency.—The following rules are deducible from the authorities as to the position of such an alienee according to Mitakshara in the Presidency of Madras.

(1) When a coparcener alienates his share in certain specific family property the alienee does not acquire any interest in that property but only an equity to enforce his rights in a suit for general partition of the entire family property. The transferor remains a member of the coparcenary until partition is effected (u).

(2) The alienee cannot sue for partition and allotment to him of his share of the property alienated (v).

(3) Such an alienee has no right to possession and no status as a tenant in common although he might have obtained possession of the property in execution of the decree against one of the coparceners (w).

(4) When a coparcener became an outcaste and was driven out of the family, and did not enjoy family property for over twelve years, it amounted to exclusion and the right to recover his share is barred (x).

(5) When such purchaser fails to apply for amendment of his plaint after an issue is raised questioning the frame of the suit, his suit is liable to be dismissed (y).

(6) The alienee need not be directed to institute a separate suit to work out his rights by a partition, but was entitled in the coparcener's suit as a defendant to get a decree for partition and claim to be allotted the item purchased by him in respect of his vendor's share, if that was inconsistent with the rights of other coparceners (z).

(7) The alienee is not entitled to any mesne profits in respect of his share for the period between the date of his purchase and the date of his suit for partition (a).

(8) A purchaser of the undivided share of a member of a joint Hindu family does not thereby become a tenant in common with other members (b).

As regards the other provinces of India, most of the cases relate to Court sales of a coparcener's share where according to Mitakshara Law the right of a coparcener to alienate the undivided share is different from Bombay and Madras. In those provinces one coparcener has no authority without the consent of his co-sharers to mortgage or sell his undivided share in a portion of the joint family estate in order to raise money on his own account and not for the benefit of the family (c).

Persons entitled to claim partition.—As a general rule, every joint owner is entitled to partition, viz., to be placed in a position to enjoy his own rights separately or without any interruption or interference by his co-sharer. The general rule must, however, be taken subject to exceptions and qualifications dependent upon the nature of the thing owned jointly, the nature of the interest of the party claiming partition, the nature of the terms and conditions on which the different joint owners held their respective interests.

It has been held that "partition" is applicable only to those suits in which the plaintiff seeks to convert his joint ownership and joint possession of the whole property into separate ownership and separate possession of a portion of the property. Therefore, a partition suit lies only when the plaintiff and the defendants have unity of interest or title in the property sought to be partitioned and unity of possession (d). Equally partition can be had between parties one of whom owns an interest subordinate to the other (e). The Privy Council has held that the right of partition exists when two parties are in joint possession of land under permanent titles although their titles may not be identical (f). In a suit for partition the plaintiff should establish that he and the defendant are not only joint owners but also entitled to joint possession as the object of the suit is to transfer the joint possession into possession in severalty (g). The Court must in each case determine whether the balance of convenience is in favour of allowing partition (h).

A lessee for a term of years is entitled to partition though that partition can only last for the period of his lease (i). And a lessee of shares of some lessors in an entire village and of shares of other lessors in a portion is entitled to maintain a suit for partition as to portion jointly held by him and some lessors (j). So also a suit for partition by a lessee against co-sharers of lessor is maintainable (k). But a purchaser of an undivided two-thirds share in huts used as residence by a joint Hindu family could not be given a decree for joint possession. The proper course to follow is either to direct delivery of possession by partition, in execution proceedings or to leave the purchaser to his remedy by a separate suit for partition (l). And an alienee from a member of a joint Hindu family is not entitled to possession of the alienor's share as a tenant in common. His only right is to obtain by a suit for partition the share to which his alienor is entitled (m). There is no fixed rule of law that a property held in temporary right cannot be partitioned, the only rule being the rule of convenience. Tenants would be entitled to partition under the section unless it could be proved there was some disability against partition (n). In the absence of proof of inconvenience to other co-sharers a patnidar whose right extends over only a fractional share of one of many mouzahs in the zemindari is entitled to maintain a suit for partition (o).

The estate of a deceased Burman Buddhist vests in his heirs on his death, but there is no analogy between their position and that of the coparceners of a joint Hindu family under the Hindu Law. In the former case the estate does not vest collectively or jointly but each heir gets a definite fraction in every portion of the estate of the deceased which vests in him separately and individually which he is entitled to claim. He cannot be decreed to be with the co-heir a joint owner or joint tenant of the property nor is he entitled to joint possession of the property with them. A Burman Buddhist heir is not entitled to maintain a partition suit in the strict sense of the word and his suit for division of the inheritance must be an administration suit (p).

Partial partition.—A suit for partition of a portion of the joint estate is maintainable when it is the only property held jointly by the plaintiff and the defendant (q).

Tenant in common.—The result of the authorities is that according to the Mitakshara a purchaser of a share in a Hindu coparcenery is a tenant in common with the coparceners other than his alienor in Bombay, but not according to the Official Receiver.—Although an Official Receiver, on the insolvency of a Hindu father, can sell the family property including the son's share therein, still the purchaser from the Official Receiver is not entitled to apply, under section 4 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, 1920, for delivery of possession of the property in so far as the son's share is concerned; his remedy would be by instituting a regular suit for possession in the ordinary Civil Courts; but the Official Receiver or the purchaser is entitled, in so far as the insolvent's share is concerned, to be given joint possession of the property, on an application filed under section 4 of the Act (r).

Official Assignee.—Where the managing member of a joint Hindu family, consisting of himself and his sons, is adjudicated an insolvent the interest of the sons does not vest in the Official Assignee by reason of the adjudication although it would be competent to the latter to deal with their shares, if the debts of the insolvent were of such a nature as to be binding on their interest.

The Official Assignee as representing the managing member, is entitled to joint possession with the sons of the family property.

There are certain rights of a managing member which the Official Assignee cannot exercise by reason of the personal nature of the rights, such as the right to live in the family house or to share in the family meals; but the latter is entitled to all other rights of the insolvent including the right to possession (s).

45. Where immoveable property is transferred for consideration to two or more persons, and such consideration is paid out of a fund belonging to them in common, they are, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, respectively entitled to interests in such property identical, as nearly as may be, with the interests to which they were respectively entitled in the fund; and, where such consideration is paid out of separate funds belonging to them respectively, they are, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, respectively entitled to interest in such property in proportion to the shares of the consideration which they respectively advanced.

In the absence of evidence as to the interests in the fund to which they were respectively entitled, or as to the shares which they respectively advanced, such persons shall be presumed to be equally interested in the property.

Generally.—Sections 45, 46 and 47 relate to transfer to and by two or more persons. The words "respectively" and "proportion" are words of severance and their employment in section 45 makes it clear that tenants in common and not joint tenants are referred to (t). In case of a joint tenancy there must be unity of possession, unity of interest, unity of title and unity of time. It has been held by the Allahabad High Court that conveyance of land to two or more persons without words indicating the intention that they are to take as tenants in common, constitutes a joint tenancy (u). The same principle would apply to a transfer of property to husband and wife to whom the English Law applies. This section is supplementary to section 44.

Three tests.—The section deals with three classes of funds on a transfer of immoveable property to two or more transferees and indicates the measure of interest taken by each. They are :—

- (1) Common fund.
- (2) Separate fund.
- (3) Presumptive joint fund.

The respective interests the transferees take in the property in case (1) are identical with their respective interest in the fund ; in case (2) in proportion to the shares respectively advanced ; in case (3), where there is no evidence of their interest in the fund, equally.

Modification.—Of the above three rules, the first two are subject to modification by contract to the contrary between the transferees entitled to the funds, while the third is subject to evidence adduced.

Common fund.—Property purchased out of common fund is held in shares in proportion to the interests of the transferees in the common fund (v).

Separate funds.—When mortgagees advance moneys according to the shares specified in the mortgage deed their rights in the mortgaged property will be proportionate to their interests (w).

Volunteers.—The section deals with transfers for consideration. Its principle has no application to gifts (x).

Revenue sale.—Where the owners, having committed default in paying revenue, their property was sold and purchased by them at the sale by the Collector, who issued a certificate to them jointly, it was held that they had equal shares notwithstanding their original shares being unequal (y).

Presumption.—Where there is no specification of the shares of the purchasers the rule of presumption laid down in the section applies and they are deemed to be entitled to the property in equal shares (z). The rule of presumption laid down in paragraph 2 applies when no evidence is available and not where evidence is available but not adduced (a).

Various incidents of joint tenancy and tenancy in common in English Law.—The essential difference between the two is that tenants in common hold their lands

- S. 45 either by several titles or by several rights but joint tenants hold by one title and by one right, but there is no difference between them as to possession and manner of taking the profits (b). Notwithstanding the leaning of late to a tenancy in common, an interest given to two or more, either by way of legacy or otherwise, is joint unless there are words of severance or an inference arises from the nature of the transaction (c). There is a difference between words which create a tenancy in common in a will and in a conveyance: for the words equally to be divided, in a will, create a tenancy in common not by force of the words themselves but by the intent of the testator, that there should be no survivorship.

There were two ways of creating a tenancy in common by conveyance, viz., either by limiting it to them expressly as tenants in common, or else by limiting a moiety, or a third, or other undivided part, to one; and the other moiety, or third, to another, etc., for, if otherwise, though the words "equally divided" be used, yet they shall signify only an equal division and proportion of the profits (d). Where persons contributed rateably to the purchase-money they were held to be tenants in common (e). In case of a joint tenancy a receiver could be appointed (f). A joint tenancy may be severed. There is nothing hard, severe or unreasonable in the law of joint tenancy, there being always an equal chance of survivorship in all the joint tenants. If any of them had a bad opinion of their own lives they may sever (g). A marriage of a woman who is a joint tenant in freeholds or leaseholds does not operate as a severance of her joint tenancy (h). It may also be severed by conduct (i), or by alienation of the interest of one joint tenant (j). But an actual alienation, not a mere declaration of one of the parties, is necessary (k). Nor will a deed of gift by one joint tenant of his moiety to his wife effect a severance (l), being voluntary and without consideration. A demise by one of two joint tenants of his part to the other severs the joint tenancy (m). As between tenants in common, possession by one is possession of the other (n). There is no fiduciary relation between them (o). Where one tenant in common receives all the profits his liability is to account to the other only for what he receives more than what comes to his just share (p). But for ordinary repairs a tenant in common has no right of action against his co-tenant for contribution (q). A tenant in common in occupation is not liable to the other for waste (r). But after a decree in a partition suit he may be restrained by injunction from destroying or wasting the property (s). Tenants in common cannot make a joint lease for their estates are several and distinct and there is no privity between them (t). And when two tenants in common join in a lease it operates as a several lease of each and the confirmation of the other. It cannot be pleaded as a joint demise (u).

46. Where immoveable property is transferred for consideration by persons having distinct interests therein, the transferors are, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, entitled to share in the consideration equally, where their interests in the property were of equal value, and, where such interests were of unequal value, proportionately to the value of their respective interests.

Transfer for consideration by persons having distinct interests.

Illustrations.

(a) A, owning a moiety, and B and C each a quarter share, of mauza Sultanpur, exchange an eighth share of that mauza for a quarter share of mauza Lalpura. There being no agreement to the contrary, A is entitled to an eighth share in Lalpura, and B and C each to a sixteenth share in that mauza.

(b) A, being entitled to a life-interest in mauza Atrali and B and C to the reversion, sell the mauza for Rs. 1,000. A's life-interest is ascertained to be worth Rs. 600, the reversion Rs. 400. A is entitled to receive Rs. 600 out of the purchase-money, B and C to receive Rs. 400.

Section 46 contrasted with section 45.—As section 45 deals with the respective interests taken by two or more transferees in the property transferred as dependent upon their interests in the consideration, section 46 deals with interest of two or more transferors in the consideration as dependent upon their respective interests in the property transferred. The former section relates to transferees, the latter to transferors. Both deal with tenants in common. Section 46 speaks of distinct interests which cannot exist in a joint tenancy. Section 46 is the converse of section 45.

Two tests.—The section deals with two classes of transferors, viz., those having interest in the property of

- (i) equal value
- (ii) unequal value.

In case (i) they share in the consideration equally, in case (ii) proportionately to the value of their respective interests.

Modification.—The rule in the section may be modified by the transferors by contract to the contrary.

Volunteers.—As consideration is an essential ingredient in the section its principles do not apply to gifts.

Persons having distinct interest.—It is not necessary that the transferors should belong to the same class such as vendors, lessors or mortgagors; they may belong to different classes such as mortgagor and mortgagee, lessor and lessee, tenant for life and reversioner, tenant for life and remainderman.

Consideration.—This may consist of money or lands taken in exchange as in illustration (a) to the section.

Co-widows.—Under the Mitakshara, the estate which two Hindu widows take by inheritance is not several but a joint estate for life (v).

47. Where several co-owners of immoveable property transfer a share therein without specifying that the transfer is to take effect on any particular share or shares of the transferors, the transfer, as among such transferors, takes effect on such shares equally where the shares were equal, and, where they were unequal, proportionately to the extent of such shares.

A, the owner of an eight-anna share, and B and C, each the owner of a four-anna share, in mauza Sultanpur, transfer a two-anna share in the mauza to D, without specifying from which of their several shares the transfer is made. To give effect to the transfer one-anna share is taken from the share of A, and half-anna share from each of the shares of B and C.

Share or shares of the transferors.—When several co-owners of immoveable property transfer a share or shares therein such transfer takes effect on shares :—

- (1) Equally when their shares are equal.
- (2) In proportion to the extent of their shares when such shares are unequal.

The section is complimentary to section 46 which deals with how consideration is to be shared in similar circumstances. Section 47 deals with transfer of a fraction while section 48 deals with transfer of the whole.

48. Where a person purports to create by transfer at different times rights in or over the same immoveable property, and such rights cannot all exist or be exercised to their full extent together, each later created right shall, in the absence of a special contract or reservation binding the earlier transferees, be subject to the rights previously created.

Priority of rights created by transfer.

Maxim.—This section is based on the English maxim, "qui prior est tempore, potior est jure" subject to certain exceptions to be noted hereafter and subject to special contract or reservation binding the earlier transferees.

Essence of the rule of priority.—The principle of priority expressed in this section is that when a person by two or more instruments creates rights over the same immoveable property and the essential incidents of the prior instrument conflict with the essential incidents of a subsequent instrument, the rights created by the subsequent instrument shall be subject to the rights created by the prior instrument unless such is excluded by a reservation in the prior instrument as a result of a special contract (w).

A familiar example is in the case of a lease where the lessee usually stipulates that on a sale of the property the lease shall determine notwithstanding the residue of the period stipulated. Cases under the section can only arise when the owner of the immoveable property has not parted by the prior transfer with his full proprietary interest.

S. 48

Requisites of the section.—The rights must be created :

- (1) at different times ;
- (2) in favour of different transferees ;
- (3) over the same immoveable property ;
- (4) they must be such as cannot all exist together ;
- (5) they must be such as cannot be exercised to their full extent together ;
- (6) by the same or different transferors.

Transfer.—Includes a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds (x). And that this is so is supported by reference to section 58 (f) of the Transfer of Property Act and the proviso to section 48 of the Registration Act. In India there is no distinction between a legal and equitable mortgage (y).

Rights need not be created by the same person.—The antagonistic deeds need not be executed by the same person under the section. The first deed may be executed by the transferor, the second by his assignor or his heir. So far as the two documents create, at different times, rights in or over the same immoveable property which cannot co-exist or cannot be exercised to their full extent together, the section comes into operation. In this the section bears a similarity to section 50 of the Registration Act which deals with rival documents which need not be executed by the same person (z).

Cannot all exist or be exercised to their full extent together.—The principle is applicable when the instruments in question are conflicting (a) and not where legal effect can be given to one without infringement of the other (b).

Possession.—The date of transfer and not possession is the determining factor (c).

Date of execution, not registration, the decisive factor.—The principle of the section is independent of any consideration of registration. It is applicable only when the subsequent instrument operates in defeasance of an essential incident of the prior instrument. According to section 47 of the Indian Registration Act, XVI of 1908, a registered document operates from the time from which it would have commenced to operate as if no registration thereof had been required or made, and not from the time of registration (d).

Abrogation of priority.—There is a notable exception to the general rule, "qui prior est tempore, potior est jure" to be found in advances made to save the encumbered property from loss or destruction. So that a mortgage executed by a receiver for the purpose of preserving the property takes precedence of all other loans, even of any loan raised at an early date for the preservation of the property (e). Again, priority is lost by a prior mortgagee by the existence of circumstances mentioned in sections 78 and 79 of the Transfer of Property Act (f).

Auction-purchasers.—As between competing auction-purchasers, the principles which govern preference are the same as those which regulate the claims of priority among mortgagees (g).

Priority of operation of deeds executed on the same day.—When two deeds are executed on the same day, the Court must inquire which was in fact executed first (h), but if there is anything in the deeds themselves to shew an intention, either that they shall take effect pari passu or even that the later deed shall take effect in priority to the earlier, in that case the Court will presume that the deeds were executed in such order as to give effect to the manifest intention of the parties (i). In case of mortgagees, where by evidence it cannot be ascertained which takes priority, they take as joint tenants or tenants in common (j).

Concurrent leases.—A familiar illustration of the section is to be found in concurrent leases dealt with in the chapter on Leases.

49. Where immoveable property is transferred for consideration, and such property or any part thereof is at the date of the transfer insured against loss or damage by fire, the transferee, in case of such loss or damage, may, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, require any money which the transferor actually receives under the policy, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be applied in reinstating the property.

Transferee's right under policy.

The section.—The section does not come into operation until the transfer is executed as the words "transferred" and "at the date of transfer" indicate. The marginal note is not correct. The transferee has no right under the policy. His rights under the section are against the transferor (1) on the moneys actually received by the transferor, and (2) to be applied in reinstating the property.

The Law of Property Act, 1925.—Section 47 (1) of this Act enacts as follows:— "Where after the date of any contract for sale or exchange of property, money becomes payable under any policy of insurance maintained by the vendor in respect of any damage to or destruction of property included in the contract, the money shall, on completion of the contract, be held or receivable by the vendor on behalf of the purchaser and paid by the vendor to the purchaser on completion of the sale or exchange, or so soon thereafter as the same shall be received by the vendor."

By sub-section (3) the above rule is made applicable to a sale or exchange by an order of the Court.

The above section differs from the present one inasmuch as the destruction referred to is caused before the transfer. Moreover, under English Law the purchaser under a contract of sale is the equitable owner thereof.

Reinstatement.—The transferee has no right to be reimbursed for his loss. His only right is to reinstatement. He cannot claim the insurance moneys when he is a mortgagee in discharge or reduction of the amount due to him.

Policy of Insurance.—A fire insurance is a contract of indemnity and where there is a contract of indemnity no more can be recovered by the insured than the amount of his loss. Only those can recover who have an insurable interest and they can recover only to the extent to which that insurable interest is damaged by the loss. An unpaid vendor is a trustee in a qualified sense only, and is so only because he has made a contract which a Court of Equity will give effect to by transferring the property sold to the purchaser, and so far as he is a trustee he is so only in respect of the property contracted to be sold. Of this the policy is not a part. Upon payment of the amount of loss the insurer is entitled to be put into the place of the insured; and if at a subsequent time the assured receives compensation from other sources for the loss sustained by him, the insurer is entitled to recover from the assured any sum which he may have received in excess of the loss actually sustained by him (k).

Vendor and purchaser.—Under English Law, a contract of sale makes the purchaser an equitable owner, whilst under Indian Law it creates no interest for the purchaser. A policy of fire insurance is a contract of indemnity, the insurance company being liable to make good the actual loss sustained by the assured. Prior to the Law of Property Act, 1925, it was settled law that "on the sale of a thing insured no interest in the policy passes to the vendee unless at the time of the sale the policy be assigned either expressly or impliedly" (l).

In England between vendor and purchaser a case arose (m) where a fire occurred after the contract but before completion. It was held by Brett and Cotton, L.J.J., affirming the decision of Jessel, M.R., that the purchaser who had completed his contract, was not entitled as against the vendor to the benefit of the insurance. They, however, doubted whether as between the vendor and the insurance company the former could retain the moneys. This expression of doubt gave rise to the case of Castellain v. Preston (n). As the vendor in Rayner v. Preston (o) had received not only the insurance moneys from the company but the sale was afterwards completed and the purchase-money agreed upon was also received by him without any abatement on account of the damage by fire, it was held that the company was entitled to recover a sum equal to the insurance money from the vendor for their own benefit. In a Rangoon case (p) it was held that a purchaser under a contract of sale had an insurable interest under the following circumstances. The property was insured on the 16th October 1928 and was conveyed on the 16th August 1929. On the same day subsequent to the conveyance the original vendor entered into an agreement with the purchaser for a repurchase of the property by 31st December 1929. On the 12th October 1929 the policy was renewed for a further period of one year to 12th October 1930. Before the conveyance was executed by the purchaser to the original vendor as stipulated the property was destroyed by fire on the 19th April 1930.

Mortgagor and mortgagee.—As between these it is usually provided in the mortgage itself that on occurrence of a fire the mortgagor shall receive the mortgage-money and employ it either in reinstating the property or in repayment to the mortgagee according to the latter's option. Such a case would fall, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, within the provisions of this section. There are further provisions with regard to mortgages enacted in sections 72 and 76 of the Act. A mortgagee, however, cannot claim against the insurance company under a policy of insurance effected by the mortgagor unless there is a covenant to insure for the benefit of the mortgagee or to apply the policy moneys in reinstatement or otherwise for the benefit of the mortgagee (q). Where the defendants assigned certain machinery by bill of sale to secure a sum of money advanced by the plaintiff and the deed contained a covenant to insure but no provision for the application of policy moneys in case of fire in liquidation of the mortgage, it was held, on the machinery being burnt down, that the plaintiff had no claim to the benefit of the policy as against the defendants, for to hold otherwise would be to make a new contract between the parties (r). A question of somewhat the same kind was decided in favour of the mortgagee in Garden v. Ingram (s), but that case differed materially in principle. In that case a lease contained a covenant that the premises should be insured in the names of the lessor and lessee, and that the moneys secured by the policy should be applied in restoring the premises. The lessee mortgaged his lease but the mortgage contained no mention of the insurance, though the lease was referred to in the recitals. The premises having been destroyed by fire, the mortgagee restored them without waiting to get the money due on the policy; and on a claim filed by the mortgagee, the mortgagor was decreed to deliver up the policy and join with the lessor in signing the receipt to the insurance office, to enable the mortgagee to receive the money payable under the policy.

Lessor and lessee.—According to section 108 (e) of the Transfer of Property Act, a lease of immoveable property is void at the option of the lessee if a material part of the property is wholly destroyed or rendered substantially and permanently unfit for the purposes for which it was let. As to the right to moneys received under the policy of fire insurance in the case of a lease, reference may be made to notes under section 108 (e).

Priority of mortgagee overrides a garnishee.—The mortgagee as transferee having a right conferred by statute to the insurance moneys, his right cannot be displaced by a garnishee order even when made absolute, if before actual payment his claim has crystallized (t).

50. No person shall be chargeable with any rents or profits of any immoveable property, which he has in good faith paid, or delivered to any person of whom he in good faith held such property, notwithstanding it may afterwards appear that the person to whom such payment or delivery was made had no right to receive such rents or profits.

Payment of rent before due date.—Rent is defined in section 105 of this Act as "money share of crops, service or any other thing of value to be rendered periodically or on specified occasion to the transferor by the transferee." Hence payment before due date cannot be regarded as fulfilment of the obligation imposed by the covenant to pay rent. It is in fact a loan by the tenant to the landlord under an implied condition that the landlord should continue entitled to the rent at the time it became due, and able, therefore, then to give the tenant a valid discharge (u). The rent must be paid as rent (v). B, having leased his land to the plaintiff at a rent payable quarterly, subsequently mortgaged the land to the defendants who allowed B to remain in receipt of the rent. Subsequently to the mortgage, B applied to the plaintiff, who was not aware of the mortgage, to pay him a year's rent in advance, and the plaintiff did so. After the payment, and before the rent had become due, the defendants gave notice to the plaintiff to pay the rent to them, and the plaintiff refusing to pay it, the defendants distrained for it. Held that the payment was not good as against the mortgagees, and that the plaintiff was still liable to pay them the rent (w). In the absence of any express agreement the mortgagor has no power to grant a lease of the mortgaged property so as to bind the mortgagee. The lessee has a precarious title as the paramount title of the mortgagee may be asserted against both the lessee and the mortgagor (x). Any lease granted by the mortgagor after the mortgage is void as against the mortgagee (y). A tenant under such a lease has no right as against the mortgagee to rent paid in advance to the mortgagor (z). But a mortgagee who does not take care to inquire of the lessee in possession cannot recover rents paid by the lessee to the lessor in advance before execution of the mortgage. Similarly, payments made by tenants to a mortgagor after a mortgage but before notice of it must in order to be valid against the mortgagee have been made in respect of rent which was due at the time of payment or become due before notice of the mortgage (a). Nor is the tenant making such a payment relieved from his obligations to a transferee who purchases the property from the transferor (b), or at an auction (c). It cannot, however, be said that a lessee from the mortgagor acquires no interest whatever in the property demised to him. The true status of the lessee was indicated in the observation in Pope v. Biggs (d), that the mortgagor may be considered as acting in the nature of a bailiff or agent for the mortgagee. Consequently, if the mortgagor after he has granted the mortgage deals with the property in the usual course of management, the interest created by him may be rightly deemed operative against the mortgagee. An illustration of this view will be found in the case of Moreland v. Richardson (e). The same principle was recognized in Banee Pershad v. Reet Bhunjan (f), report of which is supplemented in the undermentioned case (g).

Compensation or damages.—Against a person in wrongful possession the owner's claim is not for rent but for compensation or damages for wrongful possession or occupation. To such cases the section has no application (h).

Form of suit : against landlord and tenant.—Under Order 1, rule 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, a suit for rent paid in advance may be framed against the tenant and the landlord to whom the rent was paid in advance with an alternative prayer against the landlord if it should turn out that the tenant had paid the rent in good faith to him (i).

Assignment by lessor.—In order to invoke the aid of the section it is not necessary that there should be a transfer or an assignment by the lessor during the tenancy. The section is not in terms limited to such cases and its language is general. These were the observations made in a case (j) where L. mortgaged with possession certain property to S. who on the same day let out the property to L. for 12 years. S. died and his interest as mortgagee survived to his undivided brother R. who died in 1901. Thereafter possession and management of the property was with S.'s widow G. K., the sister and heir of S. and R., brought a suit against the tenant for the recovery of the rent for the years 1902 and 1903 received by G. It was held that the tenant was not liable for the rent sued as he acted in good faith and had no notice of the plaintiff's interest in the property.

Double good faith.—To enable the tenant to claim protection under the section, he must (1) in good faith have paid or delivered the rent to any person, (2) of whom he in good faith held such property (k). So that when a tenant knew that there were disputes between two rival claimants to the title of landlord, chose one of them and paid rent to him, he was held not protected under the section (l).

Reason to believe.—Section 109 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, whilst dealing with the rights of lessors' transferee, provides that if the lessee not having reason to believe that such transfer has been made, pays rent to the lessor, the lessee shall not be liable to pay such rent over again to the transferee.

Notice.—Notice of assignment is fatal to the tenant. It is immaterial whether he receives it from the transferor or the transferee (m).

Rent paid under compulsion of law.—In such a case the tenant is protected. A mortgagor subsequent to his mortgage let the mortgaged premises. Whilst the next quarter was running the mortgagees gave notice requiring the tenant to pay the rent then and thereafter to accrue due to themselves. After this notice a receivership order was made and served on the tenant at the instance of a creditor who had recovered judgment, "without prejudice to the rights of prior encumbrancers." The tenant having failed to make the payment the mortgagees threatened him with legal proceedings and he paid. The receiver claimed payment of the rent over again. It was held that the tenant having paid under compulsion of law and in consequence of his lessor's default, could set up such payment in answer to the claim for the rent by the receiver who claimed through his lessor (n).

Joint discharge.—A payment to one of three persons jointly entitled to receive the money is not good as against the other two (o).

51. When the transferee of immoveable property makes any improvement on the property, believing in good faith that he is absolutely entitled thereto, and he is subsequently evicted therefrom by any person having a better title, the transferee has a right to require the person causing the eviction either to have the value of the improvement estimated and paid or secured to the transferee, or to sell his interest in the property to the transferee at the then market-value thereof, irrespective of the value of such improvement.

The amount to be paid or secured in respect of such improvement shall be the estimated value thereof at the time of the eviction.

When, under the circumstances aforesaid, the transferee has planted or sown on the property crops which are growing when he is evicted therefrom, he is entitled to such crops and to free ingress and egress to gather and carry them.

The section.—A transferee of immoveable property with a defective title who is evicted by a person having a better title :—

- (1) Subsequently to his making improvements.
- (2) Believing in good faith that he is absolutely entitled to the property.

Has a right to require the person causing the eviction :

- (i) either to have the value of the improvements estimated and paid at the time of eviction,
- (ii) or to have the value of the improvements estimated and secured at the time of eviction,
- (iii) or to sell his interest in the property to the transferee at the market value at the time of eviction irrespective of the improvements.

When crops planted or sown under the above circumstances are growing at the time of the eviction such transferee is entitled to such crops and to free ingress and egress to gather and carry them.

Generally.—This section deals with the rights and obligations as to improvements between a holder under a defective title and one having a better title. It provides for compensation by the latter to the former provided that the holder under a defective title has made the improvements on the property in the honest belief that he is absolutely entitled thereto. In such circumstances the holder under a defective title has alternative rights against the person having a better title and demanding his eviction, to elect to do one of three things :—

- (a) Either to pay him the estimated value of the improvement at the time of eviction. or

(b) To secure to him the estimated value of the improvement at the time of eviction, or

(c) To sell his (holder of the better title) interest to the holder of the defective title at the then market value thereof exclusive of the improvements.

Not opposed to Mahomedan Law.—The rule of equity embodied in this section is not opposed to any principle of Mahomedan Law and section 2 of the Transfer of Property Act, IV of 1882, does not preclude its application in cases decided under the Mahomedan Law (p).

Compensation for improvements in cases to which the Act does not apply.—The rule in the section was extended by the Privy Council to the Punjab where the Act is not in force. The respondent on the death of a Hindu widow brought a suit as next heir of the husband to set aside the alienation made by the widow in favour of the appellant, who resisted the respondent's claim, and in the alternative claiming the value of the improvements made by him to the property while in possession which included a temple (Rs. 2,700), a well (Rs. 300), an upper storey to the house (Rs. 2,500), and repairs to the house (Rs. 1,500). In setting aside the alienation, one of the questions which arose for determination in the appeal was the amount of allowances to be made as a condition of the respondent taking possession of the house and the compound, and on the issue to what extent had enhancement of the subject been produced, their Lordships agreed with the Chief Court in thinking that it had been produced to the extent of Rs. 1,400. No compensation was allowed for erection of the temple as it was doubtful whether the property as a marketable subject was enhanced in value thereby (q). The same principle applied even before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act (r). The Transfer of Property Act is not exhaustive and does not exclude any equitable principle such as may regulate the rights and liabilities of the parties in a case not specifically provided by the Legislature. A bona fide purchaser of a house for value without notice of an existing simple mortgage and honestly believing in good faith that she was absolutely entitled to the house improved and re-built it at a considerable cost. On a suit by the mortgagee for sale of the house, held, that although section 51 did not in terms apply, yet the rule of equity upon which that section was based might very well be extended to the case and upon that basis the Court was justified in ordering the plaintiff to pay the costs of the improvement as a condition precedent to bring the mortgaged property to sale (s). In this case section 51 in terms did not apply, because the transferee was not a person evicted and the plaintiff as prior simple mortgagee was not a person having a better title.

The Mesne Profits and Improvements Act, XI of 1885.—This Act has been enacted to secure to bona fide holders under defective titles the value of improvements made by them in cases to which the English Law is applicable. Except for this difference, section 2 of this Act is similar to section 51 of the Transfer of Property Act. It is applicable to holders under defective title having a bona fide belief that they have an estate in fee simple or other absolute estate. These words do not occur in section 51 of the Transfer of Property Act, which, however, must be construed in the same way. Another difference between the two sections is that the right in section 2 is given to the person having a defective title "his heirs or assigns" which words do not occur in section 51.

Absolutely entitled.—The transferee who makes improvements must believe in good faith that he is the absolute owner of the property. Hence the section is inapplicable to those cases where the ownership falls short of being absolute and a limited owner cannot claim compensation for improvements made by him under this section. It has been observed that section 51 is based upon the principle "He who seeks equity must do equity" (t).

A lessee is not an absolute owner because a tenant could not possibly believe in good faith that he was absolutely entitled to the land (u). Therefore, for improvements made a lessee cannot claim compensation from the true owner on eviction (v). The main principle of the section is that a person must shew that he believed that he was entitled to the land in such a way that he is not to be disturbed, whether it is a sale or perpetual lease he claims under (w). The section is not restricted in its application to transferee for value and volunteers are included.

Limitation of interest.—This section does not protect transferees with limited interest, for example, as between landlord and tenant, mortgagor and mortgagee, transferee from a Hindu widow or other limited owner.

Alienee from a Hindu widow.—An alienee from a Hindu widow cannot be said to be a person believing in good faith that he is absolutely entitled to the property so as to bring himself within section 51. The Privy Council affirmed the decision of the Chief Court of the Punjab which allowed compensation to an alienee from a Hindu widow to the extent of Rs. 1,400 which represented half the expenditure made by the appellant on a well and upper storey of the house which had enhanced the market value of the property. The Transfer of Property Act is not applicable to the Punjab but the general principles were applied (x). This decision was referred to by the Bombay High Court in allowing costs of improvements to an alienee from a Hindu widow who remained in undisturbed possession for 16 years and the evidence shewed that the property was in a tumble-down and uninhabitable condition (y). In a redemption suit a mortgagee was allowed against his mortgagor reasonable and proper costs incurred in making lasting improvements (z). The decisions of both the Madras and Allahabad High Courts have been that alienees were disentitled to compensation because they had not made proper inquiries as to the power of the widow herself to alienate and consequently it was there held that they were not acting in good faith (a).

A Hindu died leaving two widows who divided the property of their husband between themselves for the sake of convenience. One of the widows sold the house which had fallen to her share. She then died and her co-widow sued to recover possession of the house. Held that the purchaser was not entitled to refund of money spent on improvements (b), nor was a transferee from a Hindu widow in a suit by the reversioner to set aside the transfer so entitled (c). The onus is on the alienee to prove the existence of circumstances justifying sale by a limited owner (d). But a gift by a Hindu widow is good against all the world until the reversion

S. 51 falls in, and even then it is liable to be questioned by the actual reversioners. Only when so questioned, if the attack is successful the interest terminates (e). The Privy Council affirmed the above decree of the High Court giving the transferee who had effected improvements, believing in good faith that he was owner, the alternative rights mentioned in the section and in respect of improvements effected at a later date at which he had not proved that he so believed, liberty to remove the materials subject to conditions (f).

Lessees.—A lessee cannot pretend that he believed in good faith that he had a permanent right to the property, and if he erects on the land let to him a building, he cannot claim compensation for it on eviction by the landlord. Such a claim to compensation is impliedly negatived by his right to remove such buildings—a right not only established by judicial decisions but also enacted by the Legislature in clauses (h) and (p) of section 108 of the Transfer of Property Act, IV of 1882 (g), nor is the rule different merely because he acted under a mistaken belief shared by his landlord that he had a larger interest (a lease of 999 years) than he really had (one from year to year) (h). But permanent leases have received a more liberal judicial interpretation. In such cases there would be a tendency to lead to a breach of contract and would be little short of direct fraud on the part of the landlord if he were allowed to evict the tenant without compensation (i). In case of debutter lands trustees are not competent to grant permanent leases and a transferee from a tenant who bona fide believed himself to be entitled to occupancy rights is not entitled to compensation for improvements on ejection by the landlord (j), but a tenant will be entitled to compensation for buildings on eviction if he proves that the landlord encouraged him to erect permanent buildings (k), for under section 108 (p) of this Act he is restricted from erecting permanent structures on the property leased and if he does so his remedy is under section 108 (h) of the Act.

Mortgagee.—A mortgage confers no authority on a mortgagee to rebuild the property so as to bind the mortgagor against his will. A Hindu widow inherited a shop from her son and mortgaged it without any legal necessity. The property was then destroyed by floods and the mortgagees rebuilt it with their own money. In a suit by the reversioner for possession of the property free from all encumbrances, it was held that no equity arose in their favour as against the reversioner who was entitled to recover it in a condition in which it was when the widow died (l). A mortgagee cannot be said to be a person believing in good faith that he is absolutely entitled to the property within the meaning of the section. But the decisions on this subject are conflicting. The rights of a mortgagee in possession making improvements to the mortgaged property are now governed by section 63A of the Transfer of Property Act, IV of 1882. A mortgagee in possession can claim for items which would fall within section 72 of that Act but not items which would amount to an addition or improvement to the mortgaged property (m).

A certificated guardian of a minor executed, without permission of the Judge, a usufructuary mortgage of the minor's property. New constructions were made at a cost several times the value of the original property. The minor on attaining majority, had the mortgage declared void, and sought to recover possession. It was held that the principle underlying section 51 could not be extended to the case of a mortgagee (n). In a redemption suit the claim of a purchaser from the assignees of the original mortgagee for improvements was disallowed on the ground that from the terms of his conveyance he could not have believed that he was absolutely entitled to the property and that he had a perfect title (o). But a mortgagee in possession who has brought the land to sale in execution of his decree cannot recover from the execution purchaser the value of the standing crops. There the right to standing crops was not expressly reserved at the sale or by the sale notice and the ordinary rule that the right to growing crops will pass by sale of land without express mention, applied (p).

As regards a mortgagee by conditional sale he cannot acquire a title to the property without going through certain formalities. If, therefore, he assumes, on the expiry of the term of the mortgage, that he has become the absolute owner of the property, it cannot be said that he believed in good faith that he was absolutely entitled to the property within section 51 (q). In a combination of simple and usufructuary mortgage a condition converting the mortgage into a sale in the event of the loan not being repaid by a fixed date is a clog on the equity of redemption and improvements effected by a mortgagee honestly believing that he was entitled to the property should be compensated on eviction (r).

Reliance was placed on the section on behalf of a mortgagee where the right of a mortgagor of a certain immoveable property was vested in three brothers, members of a joint Hindu family, of whom two passed an agreement to sell the entire property to the mortgagee who was in possession as mortgagee. The third brother who was not a party to the agreement sued to redeem the entire mortgage. It was held that the mortgagee's claim for improvements failed for he had notice of the existence of the third co-sharer so that it could not be said that he believed in good faith to be entitled to the whole (s). But when a mortgagee was misled by an order of the Court into believing that he was absolute owner, relief was granted (t). A mortgagor in possession was held to have no attachable interest in the crops cut and stored by his tenants upon a sale by the mortgagee through the Court after efflux of time allowed to redeem, on the ground that his position was that of a person acquainted with the imperfection of his title. This was before the Transfer of Property Act was passed (u). The option rests with the mortgagor as to whether he will pay the value of the improvements or sell his interest to the transferee (v). This view was the one adopted by the majority of the Full Bench in Ramanathan v. Ranganathan (w).

Belief in validity of title.—In order to claim compensation for improvements made on the property of a holder under a defective title it is necessary for him to prove that he believed in good faith that he was absolutely entitled thereto. The expression “in good faith” is not defined in the Act, but it appears to be used merely as an equivalent for “honesty.” The definition of the term in the General Clauses Act, 1897, is no innovation, but merely follows the wording in the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 61, s.90), and the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 71, s.62). Under the General Clauses Act, section 3, clause 20, “a thing shall be deemed to be done in ‘good faith’ where it is in fact done honestly, whether it is done negligently or not.” According to the said section, however, this definition applies only to Acts made after the commencement of the General Clauses Act, X of 1897. The Transfer of Property Act being an Act of prior date, this definition would not strictly apply, but its principles are nevertheless applicable. This question of good faith is a somewhat difficult question, and what constitutes good faith is a question of fact and must depend upon circumstances of each case. A person may act in good faith though he acts under a mistake of law (x). It is not incompatible with ignorance of law (y), nor is it incompatible with a certain degree of negligence which is a matter to be determined according to the circumstance of each case (z). A belief generally implies good faith. Acting honourably and fairly is not enough. There must be due inquiry, and so where a man consciously avoids inquiry he may still have a belief but it would not be in good faith (a). The words “believing in good faith that he is absolutely entitled thereto” mean a justified belief of having the full proprietary right. Cases of frequent occurrence are those of transfers from Hindu widows. A person who takes what purports to be a permanent lease from a Hindu widow and makes improvements on the property, is not entitled to compensation for those improvements, when on the death of the widow he is evicted by the reversioner. The transfer having been made by a Hindu widow, the section has no application. A person dealing with her would ordinarily know that she has only a life-interest and he can reasonably be expected to make inquiries as to the legal necessity for the widow to make a transfer (b). Good faith within the meaning of the section is not necessarily precluded by facts showing negligence in investigating the title. In fact, to hold that every default in investigating the title ipso facto makes section 51 inapplicable would be to exclude a very large class of cases from a rule which is based on obvious considerations of justice; but where a purchaser knows or must be presumed to know, which is the same thing, that under Hindu Law, the vendor could sell only under certain circumstances and he either knows that such circumstances do not exist or wilfully abstains from making any inquiries on the subject, the mere fact that he purchased for consideration will not suffice to shew good faith and he will not be entitled to claim compensation for improvements effected by him (c) even though the reversioner consented (d). Nor can a trespasser (e) nor an assignee from him (f) be said to have an honest belief in his title as absolute owner. But a purchaser either from a Mahomedan mother acting as de facto guardian for her minor son (g) or from a separated uncle acting on behalf of a minor nephew (h) is a transferee who believes in good faith that he is absolutely entitled to the property. So where a grantee of land under the order of the tahsildar (the original grant and registry by whom is only conditional) (i) paid the assessment and effected improvements in ignorance of an adverse order in appeal, was considered to be a bona fide holder within the meaning of the section (j). As also an alienee whose alienation had not been questioned for 30 years (k). But a person in wrongful possession cannot claim benefit of the section (l). In 1906 a Hindu widow sold property belonging to her husband; and in 1910 adopted a son who was a major. The property having been in a tumble-down and uninhabitable condition, the purchasers spent, in 1918, a sum of Rs. 4,000 in rebuilding the main doors and walls, and building two new rooms and a portion of the kitchen. The adopted son having sued in 1922 to avoid the sale, the purchasers claimed Rs. 4,000 for improvements. Held, that the purchasers having in 1918 believed in good faith that they were absolutely entitled to the property, had satisfied and brought themselves within section 51 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, and were entitled to claim Rs. 4,000 for improvements (m). A right to claim compensation under such circumstances was recognized in this country prior to the passing of the Transfer of Property Act (n).

And a purchaser, believing that he had obtained a good title, rebuilt the house which was in a state of ruin and subsequently it was found that he could make out a title only to a share as the house was joint family property, was awarded compensation for improvements made subject to a set-off for his use and occupation of the shares of the other co-tenants (o). Plaintiff and defendant by an unregistered deed exchanged lands and the latter erected buildings; the plaintiff lay by and acquiesced. Defendant was given compensation consequent on a decree for possession against him (p).

Who is not a transferee within the section.—The following are not entitled to the benefit of this section:—

(1) A son governed by the Dayabhaga Law who has made improvements and substantial additions to ancestral buildings standing on ancestral lands belonging to his father, the plaintiff (q).

(2) Transferee with limited interest as a lessee or mortgagee.

(3) A person having notice that the property on which he had made improvements was alleged to be wakf (r), or was subject to a puisne mortgage, he being purchaser at a sale in execution of a decree on a prior hypothecation bond (s).

(4) A purchaser from a Hindu widow when there was no legal necessity for the sale (t). A mortgagee from a Hindu widow is not a transferee in good faith (u).

(5) A trespasser or an assignee from him cannot be said to have an honest belief that he was absolute owner so as to entitle him to claim improvements made (v). Compensation in such a case is to allow a trespasser to purchase another man's property against his will. Injunction, not damages, is the owner's proper remedy (w). A trespasser is not entitled to retain possession or to compel the owner to receive compensation for the land (x).

(6) A stranger who builds on another's land, believing it to be his own, is in the absence of estoppel or acquiescence on the part of the true owner bound to remove his building (y).

(7) A subsequent purchaser with notice of a prior contract is not entitled to compensation for improvements made, for the position of such a purchaser is not better than of the vendor himself, for it is clear that if he the latter make permanent improvements the purchaser is entitled to the benefit thereof without further payment (z).

(8) A transferee after commencement of litigation in which the title is agitated (a).

(9) A donee from a Hindu widow with limited interest (b).

(10) A transferee from a tenant who bona fide believed himself to be entitled to occupancy rights therein is not entitled to compensation for improvement on ejectment by the landlord (c).

(11) An auction purchaser at a sale held under the first mortgagee's decree to which the subsequent mortgagee was not a party (d).

Transferor as evictor.—The section is not restricted in its application to cases where the transferor is not the evictor. Hence a transferee from a separated uncle of a Hindu minor who has never intermeddled or acted as guardian and who has made improvements on the property, believing in good faith that he is absolutely entitled thereto, is entitled to the benefit of the section (e). So also a purchaser from a Mahomedan mother purporting to act as a de facto guardian of her minor son (f).

Option.—Under the section the right to make election is with the person having the better title (g). But where a Hindu father both on his account and as guardian of his son executed a sale of the joint family property and the transferee spent a considerable amount for the improvement and the plaintiff's circumstances were too poor to permit of any purchase by him of the improved property, the Court without giving an option to the plaintiff to recover the property by payment of compensation, required the plaintiff to sell his interest in the property to the transferee (h). This does not seem to be a correct view of the section.

Then.—This word occurring in para 1 of the section means at the time of eviction.

Lien.—The section confers no lien in favour of the transferee for value of improvements made on immoveable property. There can be no lien which is peculiar to moveables (i).

Amount how and when fixed.—The amount to be paid for compensation for improvement is to be fixed at the time of eviction. In the event of the person having a better title desiring to retain the property for himself, he must pay to or secure the person having a defective title the estimated value of the improvements, while if he desires to sell his interest to the transferee the latter must pay the then market value thereof irrespective of the value of such improvement.

Court sale.—Section 51 is inapplicable to a purchaser at a Court sale. There is no covenant for title implied in a Court sale and the purchaser takes only the right title and interest of the judgment-debtor. But a purchaser in a Court auction who is not party to the decree is entitled to the value of the improvements bona fide effected by him on being evicted from the property owing to some defect or irregularity in the proceedings leading up to the sale. The time of his making improvements is immaterial, provided he had then an honest belief in the validity of his title. Bona fide in this connection means only honest belief in the validity of his title and does not extend to the necessity of making proper inquiries as to the title and regularity of the prior proceedings (j).

Defective title.—This phrase, used in the marginal note, is misleading. A title is usually said to be defective when it is not marketable. It is not used here in the sense of not marketable. An absolute owner may possess a defective title in the sense that it is not marketable. What the phrase here means is that the person who holds the property is not the absolute owner.

Defective title would include absolute want of title.—Defendant purchased at an auction a plot of land and obtained possession of two acres and odd more than what he had purchased. Without being conscious of the mistake and after he made improvements on the whole land, the plaintiff, finding that the defendant had in his possession more lands than were actually sold to him, sought to eject him from the excess land. It was held that section 51 applied because the defendant was a transferee of the property as a whole and believed in good faith that he was absolutely entitled to the whole property and had made improvements bona fide on the property (k).

Invalid transfer.—A majority of the Full Bench of the Madras High Court on Letters Patent appeal held that the word "transferee" in section 51 of the Transfer of Property Act includes a transferee under an invalid transfer and the words "the person causing the eviction" include a transferor under an invalid transfer (l).

A Hindu testator gave certain properties to his mother for maintenance with power of alienation. The property was subject to a mortgage created by the testator. The mother gifted the property to the nephew who sold the property to discharge the decree of the mortgagee obtained against the mother, widow and nephew. Held, neither the mother nor nephew had a right to convey and the sale was set aside at the instance of the widow, the purchaser being allowed compensation for improvements made by him, he being an alienee in good faith (m).

Defeasible title.—A defeasible title is not the same thing as a defective title and section 51 applies only to defective and not to defeasible transfers. If the vendor's estate is defeasible the transferee's title is bad. Following are some instances:—

- (a) A power of entry exercisable by a stranger in the event of a breach of covenant, unless void for remoteness. (Dunn v. Flood (1884) 25 Ch. D. 629.)
- (b) A transfer of property subject to a right of pre-emption vested in a stranger or co-owner.
- (c) When the transferee held under a settlement void against creditors.
- (d) When the transfer was made with intent to defeat or delay creditors.
- (e) Unless void for remoteness, a power of appointment vested in a stranger.
- (f) A transfer of immoveable property to a third person for the benefit of creditors generally.
- (g) A voluntary transfer followed by the settlor's bankruptcy within two years except as to any interest obtained by a purchaser for value without notice.
- (h) A transfer of property in favour of a creditor with a view to giving that creditor preference over other creditors followed by the transferee's insolvency within three months after the date thereof except as to person making title in good faith and for valuable consideration through or under a creditor of the insolvent.
- (i) An option to purchase renders the title defeasible unless void for remoteness.
- (j) A sale or mortgage on behalf of a minor by a de facto guardian and without an order of the Court.
- (k) A certificated guardian of a minor executed, without permission of the Judge, a usufructuary mortgage.

It was held that section 51 could not be invoked by the mortgagee who could not have believed in good faith that he was "absolutely entitled" thereto (n).

Holder under defective title how long entitled to remain in possession.—He is bound to deliver possession on his title being found to be defective by a decree of the Court. Even if the improvements were effected under circumstances which entitle him to their value and to a lien upon the land, it does not follow that he is entitled to remain in possession until he has been reimbursed (o).

Equitable estoppel.—Closely resembling yet materially differing from the principle enunciated in the section is the subject of equitable estoppel or estoppel by acquiescence barring the assertion of a legal right against the owner on eviction of the holder of the defective title without compensation. Where both the parties are equally conversant with the true state of facts this doctrine is inapplicable (p). On this doctrine the Privy Council observed in a Canadian case (q). "Whether there can be any estoppel which is equitable as distinct from legal and whether 'equitable estoppel' is an accurate phrase, their Lordships do not pause to inquire. The foundation upon which reposes the right of equity to intervene is either contract or the existence of some fact which the legal owner is estopped from denying." While awaiting judicial interpretation, it may be permitted to point out that that phrase has been used in numerous authorities, both English and Indian, as synonymous with "acquiescence" or "equitable acquiescence" and as comprised in the subject treated in English Law as estoppel in pais. It has been observed in this country that "it must distinctly be kept in view that cases founded upon the equitable rule of estoppel are beyond the purview of section 51 of the Transfer of Property Act" (r).

In a case decided by the House of Lords in 1866, Ramsden v. Dyson (s), the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cranworth) stated what the principles of equity on the subject were. He said (page 140): "If a stranger begins to build on my land supposing it to be his own, and I, perceiving his mistake, abstain from setting him right, and leave him to persevere in his error, a Court of Equity will not allow me afterwards to assert my title to the land on which he had expended money on the supposition that the land was his own. It considers that, when I saw the mistake into which he had fallen, it was my duty to be active and to state my adverse title, and that it would be dishonest in me to remain wilfully passive on such an occasion, in order afterwards to profit by mistake which I might have prevented." Lord Kingsdown said (p. 170): "If a man under a verbal agreement with a landlord for a certain interest in land, or what amounts to the same thing, under an expectation, created or encouraged by the landlord, that he shall have a certain interest, take possession of such land with the consent of the landlord, and upon the faith of such promise or expectation, with the knowledge of the landlord or without objection by him, lays out money upon the land, a Court of Equity will compel the landlord to give effect to such promise or expectation. This was the principle of the decision in Gregory v. Mighell (t) and as I conceive, is open to no doubt." Then, after stating that there has been a difference of opinion among great Judges as to the nature of the relief to be granted, he says: "But I do not understand any doubt to have been entertained by any of them that, either in the form of a specific interest in the land, or in the shape of compensation for the expenditure, a Court of Equity would give relief, and protect in the meantime the possession of the tenant."

In that case the doctrine of equitable acquiescence was considered and it was held not to apply to the case of a tenant who, with a knowledge of the extent of his own rights, did an act which was at variance with and in excess of those rights. The principle upon which the doctrine of acquiescence is based is that a man who acts in such a way as would make it fraudulent for him to set up his legal rights will be deprived of those rights. But where his acquiescence or other conduct does not amount to a fraud, actual or constructive, he cannot be deprived of his legal rights.

S. 51 The elements or requisites necessary to constitute fraud of that description were laid down by Fry, J., in Willmott v. Barber (u) in the following terms:—

- (1) The plaintiff must have made a mistake as to his legal rights.
- (2) The plaintiff must have expended some money or must have done some act (not necessarily on the defendant's land) on the faith of his mistaken belief.
- (3) The defendant, the possessor of the legal right, must know of the existence of his own right, which is inconsistent with the right claimed by the plaintiff.
- (4) The defendant, the possessor of the legal right, must know of the plaintiff's mistaken belief of his rights. If he does not, there is nothing which calls upon him to assert his own rights.
- (5) The defendant, the possessor of the legal right, must have encouraged the plaintiff in his expenditure of money or in the other acts which he has done either directly or by abstaining from asserting his legal rights.

“Where all these elements exist there is a fraud of such a nature as will entitle the Court to restrain the possessor of the legal right from exercising it, but in my judgment nothing short of this will do.” He adhered to this view in a later case (v). Upon the authority of that case it must be held that mere silence or even acquiescence on the part of a person possessing a legal right will not deprive him of that right unless all the above elements of fraud exist. This appears no doubt to be the law in England. But it will be observed that to raise such an equity, two things are required, first, that the person expending the money supposes himself to be building on his own land; and, secondly, that the real owner at the time of the expenditure knows that the land belongs to him and not to the person expending the money in the belief that he is the owner. The law as laid down in section 51 of the Transfer of Property Act does not in all respects follow the law of England.

In India the leading case on the subject is Beni Ram v. Kundan Lal (w). There was a lease given in 1858 of six bighas of land for a term of years (ending with the then current revenue settlement of the mouzah in which the land leased was situate) for the construction thereon of a saltpetre factory. During the term of the lease, the tenant, after the completion of the factory, and, in fact, after it had ceased to exist, erected houses on the land, at a considerable cost, with the knowledge of and without any interference or objection on the part of the landlord. A suit in ejectment brought after the termination of the lease, was dismissed by the Indian Courts (including the High Court on second appeal) on the ground that the landlord stood by and acquiesced in the erection of the permanent structures. On appeal (by special leave) their Lordships of the Privy Council, in reversing the decree of the Courts below and passing a decree in ejectment, with liberty to the tenant to remove the houses built on the land, observed that “in order to raise the equitable estoppel which was enforced against the appellants by both the Appellate Courts below, it was incumbent upon the respondents to show that the conduct of the owner, whether consisting in abstinence from interfering, or in active intervention, was sufficient to justify the legal inference that they had, by plain implication, contracted that the right of tenancy under which the lessees originally obtained possession of the land should be changed into a perpetual right of occupation.”

(w) (1899) 21 All. 496, 26 I. A. 58.

They further drew attention to the fact that the maxim of the English Law "quicquid inædificatur solo solo cedit" has no application in India and that the established rule is that the lessee may remove at any time during the continuance of the lease all things which he has attached to the earth, provided he leaves the property in the state in which he received it; implying thereby that there is thus in India even less reason than in England, for raising a plea of equitable estoppel against the landlord in the case of a lease for a term of years. This subject is outside the operation of the section but further reference may be made to the undermentioned cases (x).

What are improvements.—The improvement must be one which would raise the value of the property permanently (y). Ordinary repairs such as putting up a staircase (z) is not an improvement within the meaning of the section. But where an uninhabitable house was very largely rebuilt, costs claimed by the purchasers as improvements in rebuilding the main doors and walls and building two new rooms and a portion of the kitchen were allowed (a). The amount of expenditure made had occasionally very little to do with the real issue,—to what extent has enhancement of the subject been produced (b). The amount payable is not what was actually spent at the time of effecting improvements but the increased value of the property at the time the estimate is made (c). The rule in para 2 of the section is that the amount to be paid or secured in respect of such improvement shall be the estimated value thereof at the time of the eviction. While in the event of the transferee purchasing the interest of the evictor he must pay the then market value of that interest irrespective of the value of such improvement. So that sale is to be at market value, payment or security at estimated value. In either case, the valuation to be made at the time of eviction.

Severance of improvements effected in good faith from those not proved to be so effected.—Such a question arose before the Madras High Court where the alienation was not questioned for 30 years and the transferee in an honest belief in his title effected improvements but when at the end of 30 years the title was questioned by suit, he still made some improvements. On the question of compensation it was decided that a certain sum be paid to him for improvements prior to a date named which were effected in good faith that he was the owner, but that as regards improvements effected at a later date, at which he had not proved that he so believed, liberty was given to remove the materials subject to conditions, namely, that if the portion so built could be definitely ascertained the transferee be allowed to remove the materials therefrom in the presence of an officer of the Court and of the plaintiff or his son so as not to cause any diminution in the value of the remainder of the building, the removal to be carried out within one month of

S. 51 ascertainment by the Court whether this part of the building could be satisfactorily identified (d).

Improvements disregarded.—When the owner of the better title sells his interest in the property to the transferee improvements made by the person with a defective title are not to be taken into consideration.

Improvement secured.—In the event of the person with a better title requiring the eviction of the holder of the defective title he has to secure the improvements made by the latter but the section is silent as to the form the security should take and for how long the amount secured is to remain unpaid, nor is it stated what interest the person with the better title is liable to pay on the amount secured.

Revaluation in execution proceedings.—Where a sum was fixed as value of improvements made by the mortgagee which between the passing and the execution of the decree had increased in value, the Court held that under the altered circumstances the mortgagee was entitled to a revaluation in execution proceedings (e). The same principle was applied in favour of the mortgagor when the improvements diminished in value within the period fixed for redemption (f).

Injunction.—Where improvements are effected by a person under circumstances which entitle him to their value it does not follow that he is entitled to remain in possession until he has been reimbursed (g).

Removal of materials.—The section is silent as to whether the holder of the defective title who is not entitled to any relief under the section can remove the materials utilized by him in effecting improvements. The principle enunciated in the section is an exception to the maxim, "quicquid plantator solo solo cedit," and unless the equitable grounds mentioned in the section are made out the moment the improvements are made they belong to the owner of the land by operation of law (h). In Rangoon the right of removal has been denied on the ground that it would render the provisions of section 51 nugatory (i). In Allahabad, however, the Court granted a mortgagee from a Hindu widow three months' time for removing the materials of the house constructed by him (j). A similar view was adopted by the Madras High Court in a case which went up to the Privy Council. There liberty was given to remove the materials subject to certain conditions (k). Notwithstanding section 51 a lessee has a right to remove materials in certain circumstances under section 108, clause (h) of the Transfer of Property Act, IV of 1882, which debars him from erecting permanent structures on the land leased under section 108 (p).

"Lis pendens."—Improvements effected by a transferee pending a suit wherein the property is in question cannot be said to have been made by him in the bona fide belief that he is absolutely entitled to the property (l). Nor is a party who is put into possession under a decree of the Court which is subsequently reversed entitled to costs of improvements effected while in possession (m). The rule laid down in Mathumsa Rowthan v. Apsa Bin (n) as to an auction purchaser who is not a party to the suit being entitled to compensation for improvements when he is subsequently ousted from possession on account of the sale being set aside is not applicable to a party to a litigation making improvements during the progress of the contest.

Vendor purchaser.—If there be a treaty for the purchase of land and there be disagreement as to terms and the intended purchaser nevertheless expends money upon it, the vendor is not estopped by acquiescence (o). Where a purchaser bona fide takes possession of more land than that purchased and makes improvements on the excess land he is entitled to compensation on eviction (p).

Costs.—The section does not state—

(i) who is to pay the costs of estimating the value of the improvements and what is to happen in case a difference arises between the valuers employed by the rival parties,

(ii) who is to pay the costs of preparation, stamp and registration of the mortgage or other security to be executed by the holder of the better title,

(iii) who is to pay the costs of the preparation, stamp and registration of the conveyance on a sale of the interest of the holder of the better title to the transferee.

As to (i), it seems that the costs should be shared by both the parties if a common valuer be employed or that each party should bear his own costs where separate valuers are engaged. In case of difference the parties must stipulate for a reference to an umpire.

As to (ii), both on principle and in practice the person giving the security must pay all costs. Stamp duty is payable by him under section 29 (a) of the Stamp Act, II of 1899.

As to (iii), costs of preparation of a conveyance is usually borne by the purchaser, including registration and stamp duty which latter is payable by him under section 29 (a) of the Indian Stamp Act, II of 1899.

Crops planted or sown on the property.—As to crops, the section declares that he is entitled to gather and carry them and for that purpose to free egress and ingress. He cannot defer delivery on this ground. The section deals with crops which are growing and not with crops which have grown and are ready for being cut. It therefore becomes necessary to consider such a transferee's rights to adopt measures to protect the crops before they are grown and ready to be cut. The section is silent on the subject. Presumably he is entitled to take steps to protect the crops before they are ready to be cut. But he is not entitled to resist possession until the crops he has sown are cut. The rule in para 3 creates no bar to eviction in such a case but only lays down that the transferee is entitled to the crops sown by him and to free ingress and egress to gather and carry them (q). The section deals with immoveable property which according to section 3 of this Act does not include growing crops. Although under this section a lessee as being a person not believing in good faith that he is absolutely entitled to the property, cannot take advantage of the rule in para 3, nevertheless such a right is recognized when a lease of uncertain duration determines by any means except the fault of the lessee under section 108 (i) of the Transfer of Property Act. But a mortgagee in possession who has brought the land to sale in execution of his decree cannot recover from the execution purchaser the value of standing crops (r). Nor has a mortgagor an attachable interest in the crops cut and stored by his tenants upon a sale by the mortgagee through the Court after expiration of the time allowed to him to redeem, for he is in no better position than a person acquainted with the imperfection of his title (s).

Similarly, a purchaser of the crops from a trespasser is not entitled in law or in equity to an order deferring the handing over of the land to the decree-holder until the growing crops have been gathered (t).

52. During the pendency in any Court having authority in British India, or established beyond the limits of British India by the Governor General in Council of any suit or proceeding which is not collusive and in which any right to immoveable property is directly and specifically in question, the property cannot be transferred or otherwise dealt with by any party to the suit or proceeding so as to affect the rights of any other party thereto under any decree or order which may be made therein, except under the authority of the Court and on such terms as it may impose.

Transfer of property pending suit relating thereto.

EXPLANATION.—For the purposes of this section, the pendency of a suit or proceeding shall be deemed to commence from the date of the presentation of the plaint or the institution of the proceeding in a Court of competent jurisdiction, and to continue until the suit or proceeding has been disposed of by a final decree or order and complete satisfaction or discharge of such decree or order has been obtained, or has become obtainable by reason of the expiration of any period of limitation prescribed for the execution thereof by any law for the time being in force.

Immoveable property cannot be transferred or otherwise dealt with :

- (i) during the pendency in any Court in British India or established beyond the limits of British India by the Governor General in Council
 - (a) of any suit or proceeding which is not collusive and
 - (b) in which any right to immoveable property is directly and specifically in question.
- (ii) by any party to the suit or proceeding
- (iii) so as to affect the rights of any other party thereto under any decree or order which may be made therein.

Exception.—Under an authority of the Court and upon the terms it may impose, such transfer or dealing may take place.

fer of Property Act was passed).

Explanation.—Pendency of a suit or proceeding shall be from date of presentation of plaint or institution of the proceeding in a Court of competent jurisdiction till disposed of by a final decree or order and complete satisfaction or discharge thereof obtained or has become barred by limitation.

Changes in the section.—By the Amending Act the following changes have been made :

(a) the word “ pendency ” has been substituted for the original words “ active prosecution ” owing to conflict of judicial opinion as to the meaning of the words “ active prosecution.” The view of the Calcutta High Court was that there can hardly be active prosecution if the plaintiff took no steps to effect service of the summons or if after the decree dismissing the suit no steps were taken to file an appeal (u). The High Court of Bombay held that lis pendens ended with the decree (v) except as regards administration suits and suits for account. To render the meaning of the word pendency more lucid, to the section has been added an explanation to make it clear when the pendency of the suit or proceeding shall be deemed to commence and when to end.

(b) For the words “ a contentious ” the word “ any ” has been substituted. This change was made in view of the decision of the Calcutta and Allahabad High Courts that a suit becomes contentious only from the date on which summons was served or the defence was put in (w). But these decisions are not good law since the ruling of the Judicial Committee (x) where it was held there was no warrant for the view that a suit contentious in its original nature was not so within the meaning of the section until summons was served on the opposite party.

(c) After the words “ suit or proceeding ” where they occur for the first time the words “ which is not collusive ” have been inserted. The word collusive has been added because a collusive suit is not a real suit but merely a pretence (y).

The amendments are not retrospective.—It has been held that the amended section has no retrospective effect (z). Bellamy v. Sabine (a): This is the leading case on the subject of lis pendens. There the question was as to priority of two encumbrancers. The plaintiff John Bellamy was tenant for life of two estates, the C. estate and the S. P. estate. The latter was sub-divided into two estates, the Manor Farm and Villibers. He was also seised in fee of the estate of Cheddington which was mortgaged to the full and therefore substantially of no value. On the 8th of June 1827 the plaintiff sold the whole of his estate to his elder son, Edward Bellamy, who agreed to pay a large number of debts due from the father and also covenanted to pay certain annuities. On the 21st of June 1827 the son Edward entered into an agreement with Thomas Sabine, the family solicitor, whereby in consideration of a sum of money paid to him by Sabine and the latter undertaking to discharge all encumbrances and debts which Edward had agreed to discharge and to pay the annuities, Edward, the son, agreed to transfer the contract of his father, to Sabine so as to make Sabine the owner of the property. On the 4th of August 1828 Edward Bellamy died intestate and unmarried, leaving Francis his brother his heir-at-law. On the 23rd February 1829 Sabine mortgaged the C. estate to a gentleman of the name of Davis to secure £3,000 and in July 1830 he mortgaged that part of the S. P. estate known as Manor Farm to Thomas Brickenden to secure £3,000 to him. In 1833 Sabine mortgaged to Good and Brickenden the other part of the S. P. estate known as Villibers; and subject to the existing mortgage to Brickenden he also mortgaged a part of that Manor Farm, that is, a second mortgage to Good and Brickenden. In July 1830 Francis Bellamy filed a suit against Thomas Sabine and John Bellamy and others to set aside the agreements of the 8th of June and the 21st of June 1827 for fraud. On 8th May 1835 a decree was made dismissing the bill as to agreement of 8th June but setting aside the agreement of the 21st June for fraud.

In 1839 the plaintiff Bellamy, the original owner of the property, filed a bill against Thomas Sabine and Francis Bellamy praying for specific performance of the agreement of 8th June 1827 for the sale of the estate to Edward so far as it remained unperformed. A decree was passed accordingly on the 8th of November 1847 and it was declared that the plaintiff was an encumbrancer in respect of whatever remained of the unpaid purchase-money. In July 1856 upon the Chief Clerk's certificate it was declared that John Bellamy's encumbrance was prior to that of Good and Brickenden, it being considered by one of the Vice-Chancellors that the pendency of the suit of Francis Bellamy at the time the mortgage of November 1833 was effected, gave to Good and Brickenden notice of the equitable claim of John Bellamy upon the estate of Thomas Sabine but upon appeal it was held that the encumbrance of Good and Brickenden was prior to the claim of John Bellamy. The same principle was enunciated in Culpepper v. Aston (b) where land had been devised to a trustee to sell for payment of debts. The heir filed his bill against the trustee alleging that the real estate was not wanted for the debts and therefore praying a conveyance. It was held that a sale by the trustee pendente lite did not bind the heir. So in Sorrell v. Carpenter (c) the plaintiff instituted a suit against one Ligo upon a claim which by the decree he established to certain leasehold estates. Pending the suit Ligo sold to the defendant. It was held that pending the suit the defendant could not sustain his purchase. In both these cases the doctrine really was that pending a litigation a defendant cannot by alienation affect the right of the plaintiff to the property in dispute; and the same principle is applicable against the plaintiff so as to prevent him from alienating to the prejudice of the defendant. It is, however, not an accurate mode of stating the doctrine that lis pendens is implied notice to all the world. In Bellamy v. Sabine (d) it was held that the doctrine of lis pendens affecting a purchaser is not founded upon any doctrine of actual or constructive notice but upon the fact that the law does not give to litigant parties pending the litigation, rights to properties in dispute so as to prejudice the opposite party. Hence the rule is independent of notice (e). It is also an exception to the rule that a decree or order in a suit binds parties thereto.

Non-applicability of doctrine.—The doctrine of lis pendens does not apply in the following instances:—

- (a) A private sale by a mortgagee in exercise of power conferred by mortgage deed is not affected by the doctrine of lis pendens embodied in the section

Registration.—In this country there is no registration of lis pendens as in England except when execution proceedings are adopted. Such proceedings are registered in what is known as the negative list.

Onus.—A party who relies on section 52 of the Transfer of Property Act must shew that his suit was pending at the time when the deed of transfer sought to be impeached was executed (u).

Proper forum.—The rule applies to suits or proceedings pending in a Court having authority in British India or established beyond the limits of British India by the Governor General in Council (v). The Court must be a Court of competent jurisdiction (w), and may be either of first instance or the Court of Appeal.

British India.—Reference may be made to the Act below (x).

Transfer pending suit or other proceeding.—The bar of transfer created by the section is a qualified one and restricted against affecting the rights of a party to the suit or proceeding under any decree or order which may be made therein. The transfer must be made after the institution of the suit. A transfer made before the suit would not be affected.

Suit.—This includes a decree ex parte (y).

Compromise decree.—A consent decree falls within the scope of the rule of lis pendens (z). It has been observed that the fact that the final decree was founded upon a compromise does not interfere with the application of the doctrine (a).

Not collusive.—To attract the application of the section the suit or proceeding relied upon must not be collusive. The fight between the parties must not be sham (b). A friendly suit in which there is no contest and the decree declares rights on which the parties are in agreement is collusive (c). A suit may be collusive either in its inception or in an honest suit there may be a collusive decree (d).

Immoveable property.—The doctrine of lis pendens applies to immoveable property only.

Moveable property.—The doctrine of lis pendens does not apply to moveable property (e).

Immoveable property must be directly and specifically in question.—To attract the doctrine of lis pendens it is one of the essential ingredients that the property must be one in respect of which relief is sought so as to come within the meaning of the word "directly" and further it must be of specific property mentioned in the plaint to come within the meaning of the words "specifically."

Administration suits.—To administration suits the rule does not apply. If in such a suit a particular portion of the estate is sought to be effected in a particular way the doctrine would apply. The right to the particular plot must be directly and specifically in question (f). Hence a conveyance of property pending such an action cannot be effected. Though a mere general claim for administration is not enough, a transferee taking subsequent to the registration of an administration suit from a specific devisee who is a defendant would come within the rule if previous to the transfer the property sought to be charged in the action is clearly and specifically indicated (g).

Adoption "pendente lite"—Adoption pendente lite is not to be regarded in the same light as alienation pendente lite (h).

Attached property.—According to Order 21, rule 63 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, where a claim or objection is preferred to property attached, the party against whom an order is made may institute a suit to establish the right as regards his claim to the property in dispute. Such a suit is a mere continuation of the proceedings and any alienation during the continuance of such proceedings till the disposal of the suit brought to set aside the order is affected by the doctrine formulated in this section (i). A mere application for execution by attachment and sale of the judgment debtor's property is not within the rule (j).

Caveats.—A caveat, warning and appearance do not constitute lis pendens. If after this a writ is issued lis pendens commences but not till then (k). According to the rule enunciated in the section, although the above facts do not constitute lis pendens they would be included within the word "proceedings" in the section so that in this country the above authority would not apply.

Claim proceedings.—A decree-holder had attached the property of his judgment-debtor before decree in his suit, and, while he was seeking to establish his right to attach and sell such property as the property of his judgment-debtor by suit against a successful claimant, another decree-holder attached the same property and brought it to sale during the pendency of the appeal in the claim suit. The judgment-debtor was not made a party to the claim proceedings or the subsequent suit or appeal. The property was again sold in execution of the decree of the former decree-holder who purchased it and sued to recover possession. Held, that the auction purchaser in the prior sale was not affected by the doctrine of lis pendens and his purchase was valid as against the purchaser in the subsequent auction sale, as the judgment-debtor was not a party to the claim proceedings or the subsequent suit and could not be considered to be represented in that suit by plaintiff therein. Even if the judgment debtor was a party thereto, there is no lis pendens as the doctrine of lis pendens applies only to alienations which are inconsistent with the right which may be established by the decree in the suit; here as the sale in execution proceeded on the very footing that the property belonged to the judgement-debtor, the doctrine was inapplicable (l).

S. 52 Co-operative Societies Act (II of 1912).—Proceedings before the Registrar under this Act are proceedings before the Court to which this section applies (m).

Dower debi.—While a suit for dower debt due to a Mahomedan widow was pending on behalf of her heirs, the heirs of her deceased husband mortgaged certain property which belonged to the deceased in his lifetime. The heirs of the widow obtained a decree which could only be executed against the assets of the deceased husband. Held that this decree took priority over the mortgagee's decree and a sale held in execution thereof (n). A suit of a Mahomedan woman for dower claiming a charge on the property in the husband's hands is not within the rule (o).

Lease.—A lease defined as a transfer of right to enjoy immoveable property is within the rule (p). Further, the payment of rent in advance after the filing of a mortgage suit in respect of lease granted by the mortgagor after execution of the mortgage was not binding upon the mortgagee or on the plaintiff as receiver of the mortgage properties (q). But a lease pending a suit is not void if it be an ordinary and reasonable incident of interim beneficial enjoyment (r). Agricultural leases are included within the rule (s).

Suit to recover money lent.—In a suit to recover money borrowed by sale of jewellery pledged and if necessary by sale of property of the debtor is not within the section (t).

Lien of purchaser.—When a purchaser claims the return of earnest money owing to defective title of the vendor and who by reason of section 55 (6) (b) of the Transfer of Property Act has a charge upon the property the property becomes subject to this rule.

Lien of unpaid vendor.—Under section 55 (4) (b), the seller has as charge upon the property which becomes subject to the rule in this section.

Maintenance.—According to section 39 of the present Act, it is enacted that where a third person has a right to receive maintenance from the profits of immoveable property and such right is transferred the right may be enforced against the transferee if he has notice thereof, or if the transfer is gratuitous; but not against a transferee for consideration without notice of the right nor against such property in his hands. Mere mention in a suit for maintenance from immoveable property does not by itself bring the property directly and specifically in question. It is otherwise where a charge is created. By itself a Hindu widow's right of maintenance is not a charge upon her husband's estate nor upon the property in the hands of the coparceners (u). But a suit in which the widow claims to get the maintenance made a charge on the immoveable property is one in which the right to such immoveable property is directly and specifically in question (v). Such a transfer would also be affected if made after a suit for partition in which a widow claims a share in lieu of her maintenance (w). The decree creating the charge operates to give her charge as from the date of the plaint and not from the decree unless there be anything in the decree to the contrary (x). The same Court held that where a wife brings a suit for maintenance against her husband and asks for a charge on the property belonging to him, she does not ask for any right directly and specifically in respect of the property (y).

Mortgages.—A mortgage effected during the prosecution of a suit is ineffectual (z). A purchaser pendente lite is bound by the final decree though he was not a party to the proceedings making the decree final (a). However, a private sale by a mortgagee in exercise of his power of sale pending a redemption action is valid (b). Nor is a purchaser bound by a mortgage decree which becomes inoperative (c). Though sections 16 and 17 of the Code of Civil Procedure do not apply to High Courts in the exercise of their original civil jurisdiction, clause 12 of the Charter empowers a High Court to try and determine a suit for land if a part of it is within the jurisdiction and leave has first been obtained. In such a case the decree that a High Court passes is in no way different from a decree of the mofussil Court (d). It is true that a decree for sale is not a decree in rem but it would be a fallacy to conclude from it that a decree is not passed in a suit in which a right to immoveable property is directly and specifically in question as required by section 52 (e). To a case of this nature the observations of the Privy Council in Anundo Moyec Dossee v. Dhonendra Chunder Mookerjee (f) “that a decree for sale made in a Supreme Court at Calcutta had no effect in rem and has no effect whatever over a property in the mofussil do not apply.”

Official Assignee.—He is not affected by the rule unless made a party to the suit (g).

Ostensible owner, transfer by.—Section 41 of the Transfer of Property Act (h) deals with the case of a transfer by ostensible owner. Under that section it is not enough that the transferee should be ostensible owner of the property with the consent, expressed or implied, of the true owner. He must also transfer the same with such consent. The institution of a suit by the real owner prior to the transfer by the ostensible owner is unmistakable proof that consent did not subsist at the time of transfer. Sections 41 and 52 are mutually exclusive. The estoppel arising in section 41 cannot be such as to override the imperative provisions of section 52 in the absence of fraud. Section 42 is a general section dealing with estoppel in the circumstances mentioned therein, while section 52 is a special section applying to transfers pendente lite (i).

Partition suits.—As regards suits for partition the cases have proceeded on the meaning of the word “contentious” which word, however, has now been omitted

S. 52 from the section (j). It can scarcely be said, however, that in a partition suit the right to immoveable property is not directly and specifically in question and this would be independent of the question whether the shares be admitted or disputed and whether the parties have adopted proceedings with the object that a formal record should be made by the Revenue Court of the arrangement they desired effected. A partition suit would therefore fall within the rule (k) and if a charge be created by the Court for working out the partition such charge would bind alienees pendente lite (l) and so would a purchaser in execution at a sale at the instance of a mortgagee who took the mortgage pending the partition proceedings (m). But the principle in Jogendra v. Fulkumari (n) does not apply to a sale during the pendency of a partition suit filed by one of the sons of a deceased owner governed by the Bengal School of Hindu Law after a preliminary decree in a suit on mortgage executed by all the sons followed by a decree absolute pursuant to which such a sale takes place (o).

Pledgee.—Where a creditor suing for money lent on pledge of certain ornaments incidentally presses for the sale of the property of the deceased debtor by the appointment of a receiver if necessary, the property cannot be said to be directly and specifically in question within the meaning of this section (p).

Application of the doctrine to pre-emption.—The doctrine applies to pre-emption suits and consequently no transfer made during the pendency of a pre-emption suit can have any effect on the right of the plaintiff as it stood at the moment when the suit was brought (q) unless made to a purchaser having a preferential claim to that of a pre-emptor (r) provided that the person claiming the superior pre-emptive right is not barred from enforcing his claim by reason of limitation (s) nor has lost his right by failure to exercise it (t). The defendant purchaser, however, in suit for pre-emption cannot escape the result of the suit by re-transferring the property purchased by him to the vendor (u).

Alienation by receiver.—A party cannot repudiate a transaction because the receiver in his suit acted beyond his power in sanctioning the same, after the transaction had been carried through and after the receiver and party in suit had taken advantage thereof (v). A receiver is not bound by the rule, and in order to bind him he must be made a party to the suit (w).

Rent suit.—A suit for rent is primarily a suit for money and although rent is a first charge on the property, none is created before decree. In the case of ex-parte

Thornton (x), Lord Cairns said, "Then the lis pendens being a technical expression well known, it seems to me to be perfectly clear that it always implied a claim of right, or a claim to charge some specific property." A suit for rent can hardly be regarded as a claim to charge specific property (y).

Specific performance.—In a suit for specific performance of contract to grant a lease the property is directly and specifically in question. Consequently when such a suit results in a final decree transferring the title, that title relates back to the date of the agreement on which the suit is based and the Court will not permit its decree to be rendered nugatory by intermediate conveyances (z). Similarly, pending such a suit a vendor cannot give a valid title to a third party not claiming in the suit (a).

Surrender "pendente lite."—Under a surrender pendente lite between a preliminary and final decree, the alienee is bound by the final decree in terms of the adjustment made between the parties (b). Even after the final decree and pending certain proceedings the same principle would apply (c).

Trust to administer.—In a suit to ascertain and to administer trust under a deed, a decree was made declaring one of the parties entitled to one-sixth share in the surplus income and that the trustees should have their cost out of the trust property. The beneficiary thereupon mortgaged his share. Under a later order in the suit, part of the property was sold to realize the trustee's costs. It was held that the mortgagee's right was subject to the sale and the mortgage was consequently not an encumbrance upon the title of the purchasers. The rule was also applied where the prayer was for cancellation of a deed of trust (d).

Wills.—In bills for establishing a will, and perpetuating the testimony of witnesses, the advantage ought to be mutual, and the heir-at-law is as much at liberty to invalidate the will, as the devisees are to establish it, and must be considered, to all intents and purposes, as a lis pendens, or otherwise it would make the only method, which by the law of England is pointed out for proving a will, vain and nugatory (e).

The property cannot be transferred.—The section fetters the transfer of property during the pendency of a suit or other proceeding wherein the right to such immovable property is directly and specifically in question (f). As to what transactions amount to transfer, see (g). Where an agricultural lease made by a mortgagor benefits the mortgagee, the section does not apply (h).

Transfer by defendant to himself.—The rule was held to apply to a transfer by the defendant of the suit property to himself. But the other Judge who formed the Division Bench in that case expressed the opinion that he was not clear as to the application of the section to that case (i). The case was, however, overruled by a

S. 52 subsequent Full Bench of the same High Court which held that in such a case the donor had no power to revoke the gift prior to the registration of the instrument (j).

No contest between co-defendants.—The prohibition contained in the section is like res judicata inapplicable between parties to the suit who are ranged on the same side and between whom there is no issue for adjudication. In a previous suit by A to set aside a sale made by him to B as void and invalid and consequently to set aside a mortgage made by B to C also as invalid, the plea of B and C that both the sale and mortgage were good was upheld. Pending the suit D bought B's rights in a Court auction. In a subsequent suit by C to enforce the mortgage, held that D's purchase was not affected by lis pendens as there was no contest between B and C in the previous suit as to the validity of the mortgage and that D was entitled to plead that the mortgage was invalid as having no consideration (k).

So as to affect the rights.—The word "rights" in this rule has reference not only to the substantive rights of the parties but also to matter of procedure (l). A complete right needs a person of incidence as well as a person of inherence. No party during the conduct of a suit has any power by dealing with the property to charge the person of incidence or inherence to the detriment of the other (m).

Any other party.—The rule is enacted for the benefit of the "other party" and not for the benefit of the party making the transfer (n). Any other party means, party between whom and the party alienating there is an issue for decision which may be prejudiced by alienation (o).

Representative character of transferee.—The question whether a transferee is the representative of the transferor under section 47 of the Civil Procedure Code was raised in second appeal for the first time, but being a question of law it was considered by the Court which held that the transferee pendente lite is not a representative of the transferor within the meaning of section 47 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908. A separate suit can lie against such an alienee to recover possession of the property (p).

Whether transfer void or voidable.—The alienation pendente lite is not absolutely void. It is voidable at the instance of the party affected thereby (q). The plaintiff was mortgagee, defendant 1 the mortgagor. Defendant claimed ownership in respect of item 2 of the property, the subject-matter of the suit. The plaintiff was granted a decree in respect of half of item 2. The mortgage in favour of the plaintiff was during the pendency of the suit for partition instituted by defendant 3. Defendant 3 being declared entitled to one-half of the mortgage property, the mortgagee was only entitled to the extent of one-half (r).

Alienee how far bound.—An alienee pendente lite is bound by the result of the suit although he is not a party to it, for the section says that the property cannot be transferred or otherwise dealt with by any party to the suit or proceeding so as to affect the rights of any other party thereto under any decree or order which may be made therein. Pendente lite neither party to the litigation can alienate the property in dispute so as to affect his opponent and it is immaterial whether the alienees pendente lite had or had no notice of the pending proceedings for if that were not so there would be no certainty that the litigation would come to an end (s). A separate suit can lie against such an alienee to recover possession of the property (t).

Permitted alienation.—An alienation made under an authority of the Court is not prohibited (u). The Court must be one in which the suit or proceeding is pending.

Commencement, continuance and termination of any suit or proceeding.—To remove the conflict of decisions on this subject an explanation has been added to the section by the Transfer of Property Amendment Act (v).

Competent jurisdiction.—To attract the doctrine a suit or proceeding referred to in the section must be in a Court of competent jurisdiction.

The doctrine of "lis pendens" differs from the doctrine of notice.—The doctrine of lis pendens is not based on the equitable doctrine of notice, but on the ground that it is necessary in the administration of justice that the decision of the Court should be binding on litigants and those deriving title from them pendente lite, whether with notice of the suit or not (w). A similar observation was made in Nathaji Anandray v. Nana (x).

The doctrine of contribution is affected by the doctrine of "lis pendens."—Two properties, A and B, belonging to different owners, were mortgaged under a joint bond for the same debt. The mortgagee put his bond in suit, and having obtained a decree caused property A to be sold, the proceeds of which proved more than sufficient to satisfy the whole mortgage debt. Before such sale, however, X had, in execution of a simple money decree, acquired a share in property A. X accordingly sued for contribution from property B in that, so far as his share in property A went, he had satisfied the mortgage debt, and ultimately obtained a decree in his favour; but during the pendency of that litigation, property B had been transferred to Y. Held that Y must take the property subject to X's right to contribution from it in respect of the loss of his share in property A (y).

Dismissal of suit.—When a suit or proceeding is dismissed for technical defect and it is revived the lis would be deemed to be pending between the date of dismissal and restoration.

O. 22, r. 10 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908.—This prescribes the rule of procedure in case of assignment before final order in a suit. Here in this rule interest means interest in the property in suit (z). This rule can only apply to assignment of interest by defendant on record and not the assignment of interest by the person who is not a party to the suit at the time of the assignment but was subsequently joined. The doctrine of lis pendens does not apply to such assignment (a). An applicant who invokes the aid of O. 22, r. 10 is not entitled, as a matter of right, to an order in his favour regardless of delay or laches. The Court has undoubtedly a discretion in the matter which must be judicially exercised (b).

S. 52 No doubt the Courts exercise great caution in permitting a purchaser of this kind to become a party. But when brought on record he is entitled to conduct all proceedings from the date he is added a party, though he would be bound by all previous orders and could not raise a defence not open to his transferor (c). An order dismissing on merits an application by the assignee of a party to a suit to be brought on record is a judgment within the meaning of clause 15 of the Letters Patent and an appeal lies therefrom (d). An alienee pendente lite though not a party to the suit is bound by the decree (e). He is not a representative within the meaning of section 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the alienor (f). The Allahabad decisions to the contrary limit his representative character as being competent to raise under that section in execution of that decree any of the questions mentioned in that section (g).

Extension of the doctrine to execution proceedings.—The protection afforded against resistance to delivery of possession to decree-holder or purchaser of property sold in execution of a decree under O.21, rules 99 and 101 is denied under O.21, r. 102 to a person to whom the judgment debtor has transferred the property against institution of the suit in which the decree was passed unless he be a transferee under a possessory mortgage anterior in date to the suit (h). Again, relief granted by way of injunction though purely personal and which had ceased to be operative by reason of the judgment-debtor's death was held binding on a transferee as the transfer was not made under an authority of the Court (i). In a later case the same Court held that a decree for injunction did not run with the land, and in the absence of any statutory provision such a decree cannot be executed against the purchaser from the judgment-debtor (j).

Time for raising the plea.—Being a point of law, though not raised in the written statement, it should be considered even by the Court of Appeal (k).

Not an encumbrance.—Lis pendens is not an encumbrance. It only amounts to a notice of a claim upon the subject of the suit which may be unfounded. It is no ground for resisting specific performance (l).

No charge or lien.—Lis pendens does not create a charge or lien on the property. It only puts the alienee upon an inquiry into the validity of the alienor's claim (m).

Description of property.—The property must be described in the pleading with sufficient accuracy. A misdescription will render the section inapplicable (n). But this principle cannot be invoked by a person who has knowledge or notice of the true description (o). Nor will an amendment of the plaint by a change in the description of a portion of the property in suit for the purpose of the rule of lis pendens relate back to the date of institution of the suit (p).

Amendment to pleading.—In 1908 a Mahomedan lady executed a deed of gift, transferring seven items of a house property to S. In February 1912 the donor filed a suit for revocation and alleged in the plaint that gift had been cancelled as regards items Nos. 1, 6 and 7 as a result of decree in litigation between the heir of the donor's husband and the donee. The plaintiff sued for cancellation of the gift in respect of the remaining items including Nos. 2 and 5. On 16th May 1912 item No. 6 was sold by donee to T. for Rs. 1,000. On 21st May 1912 the plaintiff asked for and obtained leave to amend her plaint by substituting item No. 6 for item No. 5. To this the defendant added a plea to the written statement that No. 6 had been sold by her to T. on 16th May 1912. No steps were taken to bring T. on record. The decree was passed in favour of the plaintiff. In 1915 T., the vendee of item No. 6, sued for possession of the property sold to her, impleading as defendants the original donor and W., her niece, to whom the house had been transferred by a deed of gift in April 1914. Held that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed. The claim was not barred by the doctrine of lis pendens inasmuch as the amendment of a plaint such as that obtained would not relate back to the date of the filing of the suit (q).

Applicability to Court sale and revenue sales by Government.—The rule in this section applies not merely to sales by private parties, but also to sale through Civil Courts or by Government including revenue sales (r).

(2) Every transfer of immoveable property made without consideration with intent to defraud a subsequent transferee shall be voidable at the option of such transferee.

For the purposes of this section, no transfer made without consideration shall be deemed to have been made with intent to defraud by reason only that a subsequent transfer for consideration was made.

Unequal disposition in the mofussil.—Prior to the introduction of the Act in the Presidency of Bombay it was held that an unequal disposition of property in the mofussil by a person in insolvent circumstances and known to be so by the disposee will be set aside if impeached by creditors, except where the transferee has simply pressed a valid claim or made a purchase in good faith (s).

The Punjab.—The principles of the section have been applied to the Punjab (t).

Fraudulent transfer.—This section deals with the subject known as fraudulent transfers of immoveable property. Subject to savings hereinafter mentioned, a transfer is fraudulent when it is made with intent to defeat or delay the creditors of the transferor or to defraud a subsequent transferee. In the first instance consideration may or may not be present. In the second case consideration is non-existent. In either case the transaction is voidable at the instance of the creditor defeated or delayed or the transferee defrauded. The Law of Property Act, 1925, on which the present section is based, is wider; instead of the creditor being entitled to avoid the transaction the person prejudiced is given the right. The original section was founded on two statutes of Elizabeth, namely, 13 Eliz., c. 5 and 27 Eliz., c. 4. These two statutes were repealed and re-enacted as sections 172 and 173 of the Law of Property Act, 1925.

Savings.—This section does not affect:

- (i) The rights of a transferee in good faith and for consideration (u).
- (ii) Any law for the time being in force relating to insolvency (v).
- (iii) Any rule of Mahomedan Law (w).
- (iv) Any fraudulent assurance where the fraud has not been carried out (x).

Extent to which the section applies.—Section 53, so far as it deals with defeating or delaying creditors, is aimed not at a debtor who chooses to prefer one creditor to another to transfer his property in satisfaction of one debt rather than another, but a debtor who transfers his property with intent to screen it permanently or temporarily from all his creditors, who uses the transfer as a cloak to preserve the benefit of the property for himself or for some person in whom he is interested instead of letting it go towards the payment of any of his debts (y).

It is not fraudulent to shield some particular property from being proceeded against by creditors so long as there are other properties from which the just dues of the creditors may be realized and mere delay caused to the creditors in the realization of their dues is not of any consequence so long as there has been no deprivation of the creditors in respect of their just dues. An intention to delay creditors is not necessarily fraudulent or unlawful. Fraud involves an element of loss or injury of a substantial character and not merely inconvenience caused by delay in the realization of what is due (z).

The principle of the section applies even where the party bases his title on a transfer by decree of the Court to which the provisions of the section do not apply (a). Nor does the mere fact that a judgment-debtor has other property to meet the decree prevent the application of the section (b). The rule applies even though one creditor has in effect though not necessarily been intentionally defeated, hindered or delayed (c). A fraudulent transfer differs from a fraudulent preference in bankruptcy (d) which is outside the limits of this work. The principles embodied in the section are in accordance with the general principles of justice, equity and good conscience and as such should be taken as a guide by the Courts even in cases where the provisions of section 53 do not in terms apply (e).

Twyne's case (f).—This has been regarded as the leading case on the statute 13 Eliz., c. 5. Pierce was indebted to Twyne in four hundred pounds and was indebted also to C. in two hundred pounds. C. sued Pierce and, pending the writ, Pierce made in secret a general deed of gift of all his goods and chattels to Twyne without exception in satisfaction of his debt. Notwithstanding this Pierce continued in possession and sold some of the goods. He sold some sheep and set his mark on others. Held that the gift was fraudulent within the statute of 13 Eliz. for diverse reasons, viz., (1) because the gift had signs and marks of fraud was general without exception, (2) the donor continued in possession and used them as his own, (3) it was made in secret; (4) it was made pending the writ; (5) there was a trust between the parties; for the donor possessed all and used them as his proper goods and fraud is always apparelled and clad with a trust and a trust is the cover of fraud, and the deed contained an unusual clause that it was made honestly, truly and bona fide; (6) that a good consideration is not sufficient to take a case out of the statute, unless the deed be made bona fide also, for no gift is bona fide which is accompanied with a trust.

Property to which the section applies.—Chapter II of the Transfer of Property Act is divided into two groups, A and B. The latter, which includes sections 38 to 53A, relates to immoveable property. Section 53 deals with transfer of immoveable property only. The Madras High Court has held that it does not apply to transfers of moveable property (g). The case went up to the Privy Council (h). In a later case it was observed that there was no distinction (i). The High Court

S. 53 of Calcutta (j) and the Chief Court of Rangoon (k) have held that section 53 fastens itself to transactions relating to moveable property.

Onus.—The onus is on the plaintiffs who wish to avoid the transfer. If the transfer is for valuable consideration and is made with the full intention that the title in the property should pass to the transferee and if no benefit be retained to the transferor then the transfer will be valid as against an attaching creditor, even though the object of the transfer might have been to defeat an impending execution. The general creditors are not defeated in such a case, for instead of the property there remains the money representing the price and the creditors could proceed against the same (l). In case of a voluntary conveyance or gift the onus is on the plaintiff to prove that at the date of gift he was a creditor of the donor, that the transfer was voluntary and that his claim was defeated or delayed thereby and then the Court would presume that the transfer had been made with intent to defeat or delay the creditor. If there are debts due at the time of a gratuitous transfer the presumption is that it was made with intent to defeat or delay the creditors. But where there are no debts due at the time and the transferor runs into indebtedness subsequently the presumption will be regulated by the circumstances of each particular case. If, for instance, the transfer was made to ward off the effect of a threatened litigation or in anticipation of the transferor embarking upon a commercial venture or on the eve of his going into trade, the intent to defeat or delay future creditors will be presumed (m).

Transfer.—Transfer is defined in section 5 of the Act. It includes a settlement (n), surrender of a life-interest (o), a settlement of an equitable reversionary interest (p). The transfer may be with or without consideration and may be by act inter vivos or by operation of law such as a transfer pursuant to a decree based on an award. An ostensible dispute between a Mahomedan husband and wife for dower was referred to arbitration. A colourable award was made on which the decree was based, pursuant to which the property was transferred by the husband to the wife with the object of saving it from an impending claim of certain creditors. It was held that the principle of section 53 applied and the transfer was voidable by creditors (q). It also includes a lease of mortgaged property (r), partition (s), gift (t), exchange and wakf under Mahomedan Law (u), a transfer by heir or executor or administrator (v), a mortgage made by a debtor with the intent mentioned in the section would be a fraudulent transfer. So also a deposit of title-deeds by a debtor with the like intent.

Mahomedan Law.—There is no rule of Mahomedan Law which allows an indebted person to make a wakf with intent to defeat or delay creditors. To dedication by a person in debt under Mahomedan Law no protection is afforded by section 2 of the Transfer of Property Act. The provisions of the section in no way Amendments to the section.—The old section 53 has been re-cast. The original first paragraph has been disrupted. The latter portion is relegated to sub-clause (1) in the altered section and the first part thereof is sub-clause (2). The change in the paragraph relating to creditors consists in omitting the word “defrauded.” As to subsequent transferee, considerable change has been made in the first part. The word “prior” has been omitted, so also the words “co-owners or other persons having an interest in such property,” as being meaningless. The original second para has been deleted on the ground that it was a matter of evidence and one which found no place in the English statutes, 27 Eliz., c. 4 and 13 Eliz., c. 5. and one which gave rise to conflict of decisions. The third paragraph of the original section is made the second paragraph of sub-section (1). Paragraphs 3 and 4 of sub-section (1) are newly added. So also paragraph 2 of sub-section (2). The Report of the Select Committee explains the alterations.

Law of Property Act, 1925.—The present section 53 is drafted on the lines of sections 172 and 173 of 15 Geo. 5, c. 20. Formerly section 53 was based on 13 Eliz., c. 5 and 27 Eliz., c. 4. Both these statutes applied to Presidency towns prior to the Transfer of Property Act.

Who can avoid.—Creditors and persons claiming through or under them are entitled to impeach transactions under this section. As between transferor and transferee the transaction can only be impeached if the fraud be not carried out. In no other case can the transaction be set aside as between transferor and transferee.

With intent to defeat or delay creditors.—It is settled that a transfer of property made with a deliberate object of avoiding payment of just debts is not in itself a good ground of setting aside the transaction. The knowledge and intention of the transferee are the determining factors. If the transferee buys in good faith and for valid consideration the purchase cannot be set aside merely because the transferor sold the property to defeat or delay his creditors (y).

The essential ingredient of a fraudulent transfer is evidence of intention to defeat or delay creditors. Without such proof to be established by the general law of evidence the transfer is not fraudulent. Intent to defeat or delay creditors is a question of fact (z). There are no rules establishing particular circumstances to be indelible badges of fraud. Secrecy of transfer is a mark of fraud (a), whilst notoriety rebuts such presumption (b). In transactions for value there must be evidence of an actual or express intent to defeat or delay, as distinguished from a voluntary settlement where it is only necessary that the settlement had a tendency to defeat and delay creditors (c). Continuance of possession is a strong fact of fraudulent intention though not conclusive (d), for when the conveyance is not absolute such continuance is not evidence of fraud as, for instance, in mortgages,

S. 53 nor where permission is given to the vendor for his convenience (e), nor is the transaction tainted owing to an interval between execution and possession. So also a power of revocation in a deed sought to be impeached is constant evidence of fraud (f). If the intention be to convert land into cash and place it beyond the reach of creditors there is an intention to defeat or delay (g). The word "intent" connotes the one object for which the effort is made and this has reference to what has been called the dominant motive (h). The motive of the executing party is of importance. If his motive and that of the purchaser be to effect a genuine sale, although any particular creditor or all the remaining creditors are put at a disadvantage thereby, the transaction is not voidable. So also if motive be to defeat a particular execution it is not by itself fraudulent (i). In determining the nature of a transaction the conduct of the parties must be taken into consideration as a whole. The incidents of the transactions must be examined in their cumulative and not in their individual effect (j). The transferor's fraud apart, there must be a want of good faith in the transferee and the instrument must be such as to remove property from the creditors for the benefit of the debtor (k). The transaction comes within the rule if assets be removed from the reach of creditors and is not saved by reason of the fact that one of the creditors incidentally obtained a benefit from the transaction (l). But where insolvency of a partnership business was concealed and moneys were borrowed which were applied in the reduction of the overdraft of the surviving partners it was held that the deed was not void for there was no intent to defeat or delay the creditors but the object was to carry on the business and pay the debts by such means (m).

In case of a partnership firm consisting of W. & G. in insolvent circumstances where by a deed G. assigned to W. his interest in the assets of the partnership and the latter covenanted to pay the debts of the partnership and indemnify G. against the liabilities of the firm but 14 days thereafter both were adjudged bankrupts it was held that the deed of dissolution was fraudulent and void as against joint creditors and the whole of the partnership property as it existed at the date of the deed still continued to be joint property (n). In Musahar Sahu v. Hakim Lal (o) their Lordships of the Judicial Committee held that a transfer of property is not made with intent to defeat or delay the creditors because its effect or object is to prefer one creditor to another even if it is made with intention to defeat an anticipated execution.

The authorities establish, if valuable consideration is given at the time of the execution of the deed, if the consideration be not grossly inadequate or illusory and it was not proved that it was the direct intention of the parties to defeat and delay the creditors, and if the parties were acting in good faith, and if there is no knowledge and much less intention on the part of the persons from whom the consideration moved to defeat any of the creditors then the deed would be valid, otherwise not. Where, however, the consideration is a barred debt or debt not due the effect is to defeat or delay creditors (p). In the absence of any express intention to defeat, a voluntary deed cannot be set aside at the instance of a creditor whose debt comes into existence after its date if all the creditors existing at the date of the debt have been paid off; although the latter circumstance may not be conclusive it affords a very strong evidence negating the intention to defraud (q). A provision for debts in such a settlement will support it against all future creditors (r). A gift was covenous which appeared to be a mere pocket instrument not intended to operate according to its tenure and effect but by which the property was put in the name of the donee for the benefit of the donor in whose possession it remained and he acted as uncontrolled owner for his sole benefit (s). The covenous assignments referred to in 13 Eliz. are mock assignments whereby in some form or other the assignor reserves some benefit to himself (t).

Assuming that according to Mahomedan Law a gift in fraud of creditors might be impeached, the present existence of debts due by the donor at the time of the gift would not be sufficient to establish such fraud (u). Where a transfer, though in part, for valuable consideration is, as regards the other part, only an arrangement to defeat creditors, it is wholly void (v). Similarly, where a substantial portion of the consideration for the transfer is fraudulent and fictitious the whole transfer must be treated as fraudulent (w). So also where the value of the property is grossly in excess of the amount of the debt (x). The fact that the parties to the deed were aware of the plaintiff's decree and his efforts to obtain satisfaction by attachment of the property and where the consideration is grossly inadequate, the object is apparently to protect the property from the creditors and, therefore, the transfer is fraudulent and void. Further, the transferee's minority is sufficient evidence of the transaction being fraudulent although the settlement be ratified on his attaining majority after knowledge of the decree in favour of the creditor of the transferor (y). A deed of arrangement with creditors does not defeat because of some reservation of benefit to the debtor or of exclusion of some creditors (z). If a creditor having a real demand against his debtor takes security from other persons jointly with the debtor for his debt, that cannot be considered as a fraudulent transaction (a). Again, if the transfer be for valuable consideration made with the full intention that the title in the property should pass to the transferee, and if no benefit be intended to be retained to the grantor, then the transfer will be valid as against an attaching creditor even though the object of the transfer might have been to defeat an impending execution (b). So also if the transfer be to an existing creditor to whom the transferor already owed money, then even though the transferee had notice that the effect of the transfer would be to remove that property not only from the reach of the executing decree-holder's expected execution, but also from the reach of other creditors, the transfer would nevertheless be valid and not open to objection under section 53. It is open to every creditor to try his best to realize his debt from the common debtor and ordinarily in the case between the creditors he who lags behind could not complain of him who proceeded fast and succeeded in

- S. 53 getting at the property of the debtor (c). It is no part of the duty of a purchaser to see to the application of the purchase-money, and even if the full consideration be not paid it is no ground for holding that the transaction was fraudulent (d). Mere knowledge of an impending execution against the transferor is not sufficient to vitiate the transfer (e). A provision for debts in a voluntary settlement will support it against all future creditors (f).

Creditors.—The section is intended to protect creditors of the transferor not only existing at the date of the transfer but even those who become creditors thereafter. It is not necessary that there must be creditors who are defeated or delayed. Even a single creditor if defeated or delayed would be entitled to protection of the statute (g). A creditor includes a decree-holder by virtue of para 4 of sub-section (1) which follows the definition in section 2 (a) of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, III of 1909, and the Provincial Insolvency Act, V of 1920. It further enacts that it is not necessary that the decree-holder should have applied for execution. Creditors need not be decree-holders (h). The absence of a lien or charging order or decree is not fatal but such a creditor can only sue on behalf of himself and all other creditors (i). The distinction formerly between a judgment-creditor and a creditor who had not obtained any decree or order was that the former was not bound to bring a representative suit on behalf of all creditors while the latter was (j). This distinction has been abolished by the express provisions of the statute (k). If there be only one creditor the act of the debtor would nevertheless be fraudulent (l); a single creditor is included in the term creditors (m). The creditor must be the one who is injured. If he be privy to the transaction neither he (n) nor his representative (o) can take advantage. A creditor under a voluntary post obit bond is as much entitled as any other creditor (p). So is a wife under Mahomedan Law to whom dower is due (q).

Valid until impeached.—As against creditors the deed becomes void as soon as they claim to treat it as such by asserting their claim to the property though not until then (r).

Impeachment by subsequent creditors.—The section is not restricted in its benefit to existing creditors. Subsequent creditors are within the mischief of the Act and a settlement can be avoided at the instance of subsequent creditors (s). Where a deed is set aside against creditors as fraudulent the property becomes assets and subsequent creditors are let in (t).

Giving preference to one creditor.—There is nothing in section 53 to prevent a debtor giving preference to a creditor if nothing is done to affect the other creditors injuriously (u). Hence transactions defeating or delaying creditors are distinguishable from those giving preference to a creditor. The latter are tolerated by law. Mere preference of one creditor over another is no evidence of fraudulent intent. But if the creditor's purpose is not to realize his debt but to help the debtor to cover up his property, he cannot shield himself by showing that his debt was bona fide. This view is supported by the case of In re Moroney (v) in which Palles, C. B., observed as follows:—With reference to the statute of Elizabeth, "its object was to protect the rights of creditors as against the property of their debtor and not to regulate the rights of creditors inter se or to entitle them to an equal distribution of their property."

As differing from the Bankruptcy Act the object of section 53 is not to secure equality of distribution of property amongst creditors. It is firmly settled in England that a debtor, provided the transaction is not invalidated as a fraudulent preference under Bankruptcy Law, may openly prefer a particular creditor to the rest and may transfer property to him for the bona fide purpose of discharging his debt even after the other creditors have brought actions or recovered judgment and such transfers are not void under the statute of Elizabeth against the preferred creditors (w). The creditor of an insolvent debtor who dies without having been adjudicated a bankrupt is entitled to the benefit of any payment or security made or given by the debtor although such payment or security would in case of bankruptcy have been set aside as a fraudulent preference.

E. placed for investment certain moneys in the hands of her solicitor who died insolvent without investing the same. After his death a memorandum was found in his safe dated a fortnight before his death the contents of which were not known to E. Thereby the solicitor declared himself a trustee of certain leaseholds then in mortgage to himself and of a bill which he had endorsed to E. to secure repayment of the sum placed in his hands. In a creditor's writ for the administration of the solicitor's estate it was held that even if the solicitor executed a memorandum with the knowledge of his insolvency still E. was entitled to the benefit of the security as against other creditors for as the solicitor retained no benefit for himself the gift was bona fide within 13 Eliz., c. 5 (x).

If a debtor with the purpose of cheating his creditors, knowing that money is more easily shuffled out of sight than land, makes a sale and his object is known to the purchaser, the purchaser's title is worthless though he may have paid the full price owing to want of good faith. But the rule is different when property is taken for a debt. One creditor of a failing debtor is not bound to take care of another. If the assets are not large enough to pay all somebody must suffer. The preferring of one creditor to another by a judgment-debtor did not make a transfer a fraudulent one. A debtor may pay his debts in any order he chooses preferring any creditor

S. 53 he pleases for all that is contained in section 53 (y). The decided cases seem to go further and shew that though a creditor may consciously and even intentionally obtain a preference over other creditors by a transfer from a judgment-debtor, the transaction cannot on that ground alone be impeached by any one creditor if it be for good consideration and retains no benefit for the debtor.

A debtor expecting attachment executed a deed of mortgage registered as a bill of sale vesting substantially all his property in trustees for the benefit of five of his creditors. The deed contained a proviso that the debtor should remain in possession for six months and if any execution be levied his possession was to cease. A writ of sequestration was issued. It was held that the deed was not void under the statute of 13 Eliz., c. 5, notwithstanding that it conveyed the whole of the debtor's property for the benefit of some of his creditors and that it contained a proviso as above (z). Hence the reservation of a benefit to the debtor or intentional exclusion of some creditors from the operation of the deed does not render it void (a). A father being anxious to save his son (who was of extravagant and dissolute habits) from moral and financial ruin entered into a deed under which the son transferred such property as he had to the father, the father agreed to pay all his son's debts and to pay him, the bankrupt, an annuity of £800 on conditions (restraining his freedom) contained in the deed. In an action of the trustee in bankruptcy it was held that the deed was not covenous, it neither hindered nor delayed nor defrauded creditors nor was it so intended. Its object was to pay all creditors and that object was achieved (b). If we turn, therefore, to the leading authorities in England upon the matter, we find that in Middleton v. Pollock (c), Sir George Jessel observed that the meaning of the statute is that the debtor must not retain a benefit for himself; it has no regard whatever to the question of preference or priority among the creditors of the debtor. A settlement, therefore, which preferred certain creditors and tended to defeat others, might be good under the statute of Elizabeth. Nor again is it material under that statute whether the assignment by the debtor is of the whole of his property, present or future, or of any part of it. Again, Lord Justice Thesiger in ex-parte Games (d) quotes with approval the words of Giffard, L. J., in Alton v. Harrison (e). "I have no hesitation in saying that it makes no difference in regard to the statute of Elizabeth whether the deed deals with the whole or only a part of the grantor's property. If the deed is bona fide, that is, if it is not a mere cloak for retaining a benefit to the grantor, it is a good deed under the statute of Elizabeth." The transfer which defeats or delays creditors is not an instrument which prefers one creditor to another, but an instrument which removes property from the creditors as a body for the benefit of the debtor. The debtor must not retain a benefit for himself. He may pay one creditor and leave another unpaid.

When it was found that the transfer impeached was made for adequate consideration in satisfaction of genuine debts and without reservation of any benefit to the debtor, it followed that no ground for impeaching it lay in the fact that the plaintiff (appellant) who also was a creditor, was a loser by payment being made to the preferred creditor there being in the case no question of bankruptcy (f). And this is so even though in the result his remaining assets may not suffice to satisfy the balance of his debts. Even a time-barred debt is a valid consideration for a transfer of property (g). A debtor unable to pay his debts must not make a trust-deed creating preferences as it will be void (h). If bona fide it is an act of insolvency. If voluntary, it is void if made within two years of the insolvency of the assignor (i). But a trust is void against others who are not parties in the following cases:—

(1) When the deed imposed terms which might have constituted a partnership among the persons executing it (j).

(2) Where debtor has power to revoke and attempts to use it as a shield against his creditors (k).

(3) Where between the trustees and debtor there is a secret bargain to keep back a part of the estate (l).

(4) Where the deed contained a proviso that a dividend should only be paid to a creditor on his executing or assenting to the deed and that if within a certain time any creditor did not execute or assent his dividend should be paid by the trustees to the debtor (m).

Suit to set aside a transfer in fraud of creditors.—Para 4 of section 53 enacts that a suit for a declaration to avoid a transfer on the grounds set out in sub-section (1) para (1) shall be instituted by any one creditor on behalf of or for the benefit of all and not some creditors. It further enacts that a decree-holder, whether he has applied for execution or not, has a similar right. Such a suit should be instituted by one or more plaintiffs in accordance with O.1, r.8 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908. An order of the Court should be obtained by the plaintiff desiring to sue prior to institution of the suit though such leave is not a condition precedent and may be applied for and obtained after its institution (n). Death of a plaintiff whose representatives have not been brought on record within time does not cause the appeal to abate (o).

Limit of suit by creditor.—Article 120 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, applies, and the starting point is the date on which the circumstances entitling the creditor to avoid the transfer first becomes known to him (p). Article 91 does not apply. That article is restricted to suits between parties to the instrument or their successors in interest (q).

Voidable.—Fraud does not render the transaction void but only voidable at the instance of the party defrauded (r). Hence the section renders the transaction voidable at the option of the person defrauded, defeated or delayed. On avoidance, relief will only be granted on principles of justice, equity and good conscience (s). Such a person has a double option either to avoid or affirm the transaction. If he affirms or does any act amounting to ratification it is destructive of his right to avoid (t). His intention to avoid may be manifested not only by institution of a suit but by an open or unequivocal declaration of an intention to avoid (u). Delay on the part of a creditor to set aside a transaction on the ground of fraud is an equitable reply to the equitable defence but it cannot amount to a statutory bar. In Rangnath v. Govind (v), Sir Lawrence Jenkins said: “A defendant is entitled to resist a claim made against him by pleading fraud, and he is entitled to urge that plea though he may not have himself brought a suit to set aside the transaction, and is not, in circumstances like the present, precluded from urging that plea by the lapse of time.” This was followed by a Full Bench of the Madras High Court where it was said, “we do not think it follows that because a party’s remedy as plaintiff to have an instrument avoided is time-barred, his right to say, by way of equitable defence if sued, that the instrument ought not to be enforced, is equally time-barred” (w). This view was adopted by a later Full Bench of the same Court which held that it was open to a creditor to plead in defence that the transfer was in fraud of creditors (x). The practice in the Indian Courts has been to consider the question in defence and in execution (y). See also Seth Ghunsham Dass v. Uma Pershad (z), decided by the Privy Council. The English practice is the same. In England a transaction in fraud of creditors has been allowed to be impeached in garnishee proceedings (a). Reference may also be made to section 86 of the Trust Act, to Guardian and Wards Act and to Probate and Administration Act. Order 8, rule 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares that the defendant must raise specifically in question that the transaction is void or voidable in point of law.

Good faith.—In considering whether the transferor has defeated or delayed creditors, the section lays down an exception in para 2 that notwithstanding fraudulent intent of the transferor to defeat or delay his creditors the transferee’s rights shall not be impaired if he has acted in good faith and for consideration. Both ingredients are essential. A thing shall be deemed to be done in “good faith” where it is in fact done honestly; on the point whether it is done negligently or not (b) every case stands on its own merits (c). The test of good faith which has been applied in English decisions is whether the transfer is “a mere cloak for retaining a benefit to the grantor " (d). Even a transferee with constructive notice is affected (e). The transferor's intent to defeat or delay calls for no attention. It is the knowledge and intention of the transferee which is the determining factor as to the validity of the transaction. His mala fides vitiates the transfer (f). It is a question of fact in each case whether the transferee acted in good faith and without knowledge of the transferor's intent for selling (g), though the conclusions to be drawn from such an instrument are questions of law. Mere knowledge of an impending execution against the transferor is not sufficient to make the transferee a transferee otherwise than in good faith when he does not share the transferor's intention to defeat or delay creditors (h). Again, a settlement made for the protection of the settlor's family and for the correction of the settlor's evil habits has been held to be bona fide (i). A conveyance or transfer, whether founded on a valuable or adequate consideration or not, if entered into by the parties thereto with intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors, is void. It is not enough in order to support a conveyance or transfer as against creditors that it be made for a valuable consideration. Consideration of itself is not enough. There must also be good faith (j). If fair value be paid the Court will lean towards holding that the transaction was bona fide (k). Indebtedness of the vendor and purchaser's knowledge that the sale may defeat or delay creditors is not enough to negative bona fides. The transfer is valid if it is not shewn that it was to benefit the transferor. But if the object of the transferor is to defeat or delay his creditors and that object is known to the transferee and he aids and assists in its execution then the transfer is not in good faith (l). In the absence of good faith existence of consideration is valueless for "a good consideration doth not suffice if it be not also bona fide" (m). A transferee for value who takes the transfer with the intention of helping the transferor to convert his immoveable property into cash to defeat or delay his creditors cannot be treated as a transferee in good faith (n). The burden of proving bona fides and adequate consideration is shifted to the transferee on fraud being presumed (o).

Bona fide purchaser for value from fraudulent transferee.—The proviso to the section protects not only a bona fide transferee from an original fraudulent transferor but also a bona fide transferee from a fraudulent transferee (p). The object of this

S. 53 paragraph is to protect an innocent transferee for value notwithstanding that the transferor may be actuated by a desire to defeat or delay his creditors (q).

Consideration.—In order to take the case out of the section paragraph 2 of sub-section (1) enacts the transferee must not only act in good faith but he must pay consideration for it. Both good faith and consideration must co-exist (r). Consideration is defined in the Indian Contract Act, section 2 (d). By section 25 of the same Act natural love and affection is no consideration nor is a statute barred debt, though as to statute-barred debts there are dicta to the contrary (s). The payment of such debts is commendable in a debtor but payment of them by the transfer of an insolvent's whole estate to the disappointment of creditors whose claims are not barred is in itself a fraud. The consideration is wholly inadequate and inadequacy is an indication, though not conclusive, of fraud (t).

A sale of property for good consideration is not fraudulent and void merely because it is made with intention to defeat the expected execution of a judgment-creditor (u) but a deed may be void as against creditors though full consideration is given for it, if it be in such a form as to defeat the creditors and be executed with that intention (v). Existence of an antecedent debt is not (w), though coupled with present advance (x), or agreement for future advances (y), sufficient consideration. As to forbearance forming the consideration for a promise it is not necessary that there should be any arrangement for forbearance for any definite or particular time. It is quite enough if you can infer from the surrounding circumstances that there was an implied request for forbearance and that forbearance for a reasonable time was in fact extended to the person who asked for it (z). A vendee's deferred dower debt is valid consideration (a). A purchase at an undervalue from one who was outlawed and has absconded pending prosecution and with notice thereof is void (b). So also when consideration is feigned as when a man indicted for recusancy in order to defeat the King of his forfeiture conveys his properties and goods and then flees overseas (c). A plaintiff in an action in tort is not a creditor (d), but a wife in a divorce proceedings for alimony pendente lite is (e), and where a sentence of divorce was pronounced, in respect of arrears of permanent alimony and costs the Court declared the deed fraudulent and void but reserved the question as to whether the decree was right in giving plaintiff a charge on the estate for future alimony (f). But where an action was pending for trespass defendant executed a voluntary conveyance of real estate to his daughter and became insolvent after the verdict went against him, the conveyance was held void (g). The fact that a small part of the consideration is still legally due is not sufficient to vitiate the sale for want of consideration (h). Effect may be given to the instrument to the extent of the amount of the consideration that is valuable (i). It has, however, been observed that even if the full consideration be not paid it would not be a ground for holding the transaction fraudulent (j). Another view is that where part of the consideration is fictitious the transaction is wholly void and cannot be upheld even to the extent of the consideration actually advanced (k). But where the transferee has discharged a valid prior mortgage the transfer will be set aside only on his being given a charge for the amount spent by him in discharging such mortgage. The transferee is not entitled to the money debts of the transferor discharged by him (l).

Onus.—Where the transferee seeks to support the transaction on the ground of good faith and valuable consideration the burden is on the party who challenges the deed (m). If that onus be discharged it is for the transferee to prove both and where consideration is proved the Court will be slow to hold there was absence of good faith (n).

Conflicting equities.—The proviso to section 53 not only protects a bona fide transferee from an original fraudulent transferor but also a bona fide transferee from a fraudulent transferee (o). What seems to have been decided differently by the High Court of Allahabad (p) is due to the case being misunderstood. There was a fictitious mortgage without any consideration and as such totally inoperative so that the second transferee took with the defects in title of the first transferee who took nothing.

Marriage settlement.—Where marriage is entered into and the settlement executed as a part of a scheme to defeat or delay creditors in which the husband and wife are both implicated to protect the property from their claims the consideration of marriage cannot support such a settlement (q). The wife must be shewn as privy to the fraud (r). So when a wife had no knowledge of the contents of the deed and her husband's insolvent circumstances the settlement was held valid notwithstanding the falsity of the recitals as to the husband's indebtedness to the wife (s). A general covenant in an ante-nuptial settlement to settle all after-acquired property except business assets upon wife and children is not void (t) and a settlement though post-nuptial and voluntary is not void if there be no intent to defeat, hinder or delay creditors (u).

Separation deed.—On separation a trust for creditors reserving surplus for benefit of wife is bona fide and supported by valuable consideration (v).

Law relating to insolvency.—Sub-section 1 is qualified by para 3 which enacts that it shall be subject to the law of insolvency. The Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, III of 1909, enacts in sections 53 to 57 what is the effect of insolvency on antecedent transactions. Amongst them section 55 avoids a voluntary transfer if the transferor is adjudged insolvent within two years from the date thereof and section 56 avoids a fraudulent preference made three months anterior to the petition on which the transferor is adjudged insolvent. Section 55 protects a transferee in good faith and for valuable consideration while section 56 protects a similar transferee from a creditor obtaining preference from the debtor. Connected with these sections is section 9 of the same Act which enumerates the numerous instances when a man is deemed to have committed an act of insolvency wherein is included sub-clause (b) whereby a debtor commits an act of insolvency, "if in British India or elsewhere he makes a transfer of his property or of any part thereof with intent to defeat or delay his creditor." Unlike section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act which renders transfers coming within its operation voidable all transfers made under sections 55 and 56 are void as against the Official Assignee. The fundamental distinction between section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act and section 56 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act is that under the first Act one creditor may be preferred to another while under the latter Act such a transaction is void on the ground that the transferee cannot be said to be acting in good faith (w). A debtor commits an act of insolvency on execution of a composition deed in favour of trustees for the benefit of his creditors (x). In ascertaining property available for debts it has been provided that the Official Assignee's title shall be deemed to have relation back to and to commence at (a) the time of the commencement of the act of insolvency on which an order of adjudication is made against him or (b) if the insolvent is proved to have committed more acts of insolvency than one, the time of the first of the acts of insolvency proved to have been committed by the insolvent within three months next preceding the date of the presentation of the insolvency petition (y), and therefore the original transferee cannot convey any saleable interest to a subsequent transferee (z). When the execution of a sale deed requiring registration is relied upon as an act of insolvency the three months must be calculated from the date of registration (a). The onus of proving that a particular transfer effected by the insolvent is void as against the Official Assignee under section 56 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act is on the Official Assignee whereas the onus of proving good faith and valuable consideration in a case coming under section 55 is on the transferee (b).

Proceeding to set aside the transfer.—A transaction under section 53 is voidable at the instance of a creditor, whilst under sections 55 and 56 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, III of 1909, and sections 53 and 54 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, V of 1920, it is void against the Official Assignee, and any creditor may take proceedings to avoid the transaction. The word "void" in section 53 of the Provincial Insolvency Act and section 55 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act means only "voidable." It is only the Official Receiver or the Official Assignee and not anybody else, i.e., a purchaser from him that can get such a transfer set aside (c). Just as section 4 of the Provincial Insolvency Act confers powers to determine the question of title no such express power is conferred by the corresponding section 7 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act.

Under the first-mentioned Act the remedy is necessarily by a suit, whilst under the Insolvency Acts on the question of procedure there has been a divergence of opinion between the different Courts in India. The Calcutta High Court has held that the Legislature has invested the Insolvency Court with extensive powers under section 4 of the Provincial Insolvency Act to investigate questions of title raised by a stranger when possession is to be given to a purchaser from an Official Receiver. It does not, however, follow from this that the Court has exclusive jurisdiction to deal with all questions of title that may possibly be but are not actually raised by a stranger. But if a stranger raises a question of title for its decision, that decision is binding on him. It is true that the circumstances under which questions of title should or should not be investigated or determined have not been defined in the Acts and the Legislature has left the matter to the discretion of the Court itself (d). The same Court in an earlier case held that a question as to whether a purchase ten years ago in the name of a lady was a purchase benami, is a long way from bringing within anything that section 36 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act contemplates, observing that the correct course in such a case where there is any real conflict is either to proceed by way of a motion before the Insolvency Judge or to proceed by way of suit (e). The Allahabad and the Madras High Courts have held that any question as to the invalidity of a transaction raised by the Official Assignee can be determined only by the Insolvency ordinary Civil Court (f). These decisions are under the Provincial Towns Insolvency Act which empowers the Insolvency Court to adjudicate on the question of title. A later decision of the Madras High Court has, however, taken a different view. It was there held that there was nothing in the Provincial Insolvency Act or in Mariappa Pillai v. Raman Chettiya (g) to prevent the creditors, and therefore the Official Receiver, from proceeding under section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act if they wish and the fact that they have another remedy under section 53 of the Provincial Insolvency Act does not deprive them of their right of suit under section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act (h). The same Court when the question arose under the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act observed that these decisions proceeded on the ground that when a special forum is constituted by a special Act questions arising under that Act must be determined by that forum. Sections 55 and 56 are special provisions relating to insolvency and it is only in insolvency that these transactions can be impeached as voidable if they do not fall under section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act, so that a transaction not falling under the Transfer of Property Act can only be avoided by sections 55 and 56 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act (i). With respect, it is submitted that these decisions of the Madras High Court do not seem to be sound.

The Calcutta High Court has adopted the English decisions. Section 72 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, effected a change in the law as it stood under the earlier Act of 1849. In the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, section 72 of the Act of 1869 was re-enacted as section 105 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. The diversity of judicial opinion such as there existed prior to 1883 has been pointed out in the case of Fool Kumari v. Khirod Chandra (j). In that case the present state of the law as established by decisions under the Acts of 1883 and 1914 has been said to be this :—"That the jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Courts to adjudicate on the rights of third parties is now fully recognized though it has also been laid down that there is a discretion in the Bankruptcy Courts to direct the trustee to institute or defend in the ordinary Civil Courts suits concerning the rights of third parties." The words of section 4 of the Provincial Insolvency Act are, if at all, wider than those of section 105 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. The word "title" is expressly mentioned in section 4 of the Provincial Insolvency Act while in section 7 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act it is not.

Presumption of fraud.—Except when parties stand on unequal footing fraud is never presumed in law though prior to the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, a rule of presumption since abrogated was laid down in paragraph 2 of sub-section (1) in cases of gratuitous transfers and transfers for grossly inadequate consideration to bring the law in India in conformity with the decisions of the English Courts.

In Spirett v. Willows (k) Lord Westbury, in setting aside a settlement made by a man reserving other property for payments to creditors who were, however, not paid, said, if the debt of the creditor by whom the voluntary settlement is impeached, existed at the date of the settlement and the remedy of the creditor is defeated or delayed by the existence of the settlement, it is immaterial whether the debtor was or was not solvent after making the settlement. But if a voluntary settlement or deed of gift be impeached by subsequent creditors, whose debts had not been contracted at the date of the settlement, then it is necessary to show either that the settlor made the settlement with express intent to "delay, hinder or defraud creditors," or that after the settlement the settlor had no sufficient means or reasonable expectations of being able to pay his then existing debts."

In Holmes v. Penney (l), Wood, V. C., said : "Where, in order to evade the statute, a person being considerably indebted makes a voluntary settlement which would be void if impeached by those who were then his creditors and afterwards pays them off, and a new set of creditors stand in their places, such a settlement would be void against the subsequent creditors because it would be a fraud upon the statute." The above dicta were considered and commented on in Freeman v. Pope (m), where in setting aside a voluntary settlement by the execution of which the settlor was rendered absolutely insolvent it was laid down that the intention to defeat or delay creditors by such an instrument may be inferred in many ways and amongst these where, after deducting from the settlor's property, the particulars settled, he is not left with enough to pay his debts. This doctrine of inference that a man intends the natural and necessary result of his acts was entirely abjured by Lord Esher, M.R., in ex-parte Mercer in re Wise (n). There an honest man not in fact indebted at all made a voluntary settlement in favour of his wife, marriage with whom constituted a breach of promise of marriage with another who sued him and succeeded in obtaining damages for the breach. It was held there was not sufficient evidence to find that the settlement was intended to delay, hinder or defeat creditors and that such delay, hindrance or defeat was not a necessary consequence of the settlement. Ex-parte Mercer was approved in Re. Holland (o), in which it was held that in each case you must look at the whole of the circumstances surrounding the execution of the conveyance and then ask yourself the question whether the conveyance was in fact executed with intent to defeat and delay creditors. The principle now established is that in each particular case the Court is to decide whether on all the circumstances it can come to the conclusion that the intention of the settlor in making the settlement was to defeat, hinder or delay his creditors (p). The facts should be considered in relation to each other and weighed as a whole. It is a fallacious method to consider separately each fact which militates against the bona fide nature of the transaction and which by itself may be susceptible of explanation. Secrecy, haste in execution and unsatisfactory nature of the evidence as to settlement of accounts were held to raise an irresistible inference of fraud on creditors (q). Fraud is not capable of being established in a majority of cases by positive proof being in its very nature secret. In the generality of cases circumstantial evidence is the only resource in dealing with questions of fraud (r).

The circumstances that on sale the vendor reserved nothing to himself, that the purchaser bought the property without seeing it or taking care to value it, that the consideration consisted of debts time-barred, that it was grossly inadequate, and possession remained with the vendor were considered as indicia of fraud (s).

Fraudulent attempt defeated.—Section 53 (1) has been enacted for the benefit of creditors. Only a creditor can take advantage of this sub-section to defeat fraudulent transfer.

The transferee, however, is given the benefit when he acts bona fide for valuable consideration and the creditors' right is subject to the law relating to insolvency, but a third exception is to be found in the case of the transferor entitled to avoid the transaction on the ground that the purpose of the fraud has not been accomplished. The maxim "in pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis" has no application as the parties are not in pari delicto. The leading case on this subject is Pether-permal Chetty v. Muniandi Servai (t), a decision of the Judicial Committee in which their Lordships held that the purpose of the fraud having not only not been effected but absolutely defeated, there was nothing to prevent the plaintiff from repudiating the entire transaction, revoking all authority of his confederate to carry out the fraudulent scheme and recovering possession of his property. The decision of the Court of Appeal in Taylor v. Bowers (u) and the authorities upon which that is based clearly establishes this. Symes v. Hughes (v) and In re Great Berlin Steam Boat Co. (w) are to the same effect.

The authorities have been fully reviewed in Jadunath v. Rup Lal (x). If the fraudulent object is accomplished, or accomplished even partially, the general rule of equity is that the transferee would not be disturbed in order to enable the fraudulent confederate to retain the property transferred to him. The Law lays no locus pœnitentiæ (y). In order to be effective the fraud or contemplated fraud must, according to the authorities, be effected (z). This distinction between the effect of fraud merely intended and a fraudulent purpose actually accomplished has been recognized by the Indian Legislature in section 84 of the Indian Trust Act, II of 1882, which enables the fraudulent grantor to contend that the deed is a nullity. In India a transaction by which property is conveyed in the name of a person other than the one paying the consideration is by no means uncommon, a dealing common to Hindus and Mahomedans alike and much in use in India. Known as benami transactions they bear a curious resemblance to what are known to English Law as resulting trusts recognized in India by section 82 of the Indian Trust Act, II of 1882. The rule of English Law is very nearly the same. The English Law has engrafted an exception on this rule where the transferee is the wife or the child (a) which, however, does not extend to India as the presumption, not irrebutable (b), of English Law of advancement or gift does not obtain in this country (c) unless the parties, though permanent residents of India, were born of English parents to whom the English Law with rebuttable presumption of advancement is applicable (d). But the relationship is a circumstance which is taken into consideration in India in determining whether the transaction is benami or not (e). The general rule in India, in the absence of all other relevant circumstances, is to consider from what source the money proceeded with which the purchase-money was paid (f), an important fact but not the only test of ownership (g). All the surrounding circumstances may be evidence to support or rebut the presumption of suggested advancement or gift.

Rights of transferee under the section.—If he has participated in the fraud of his transferor he is entitled to no relief. It is otherwise where he is a transferee in good faith and for consideration. So also a fraudulent conveyance is purged by a good one. If a conveyance be made by fraud and afterwards the land is conveyed over upon valuable consideration bona fide the fraud is purged (h).

Transferor possessed of properties other than those forming the subject of transfer impeached—The mere fact that the transferor has other properties to satisfy the creditors does not prevent the application of section 53 (i). In Alton v. Harrison (j), Giffard, L. J., observed: "I have no hesitation in saying that it makes no difference in regard to the statute of Elizabeth whether the deed deals with the whole or only a part of the grantor's property."

Second appeal.—Although intent to defeat, hinder or delay has been said to be a question of fact, questions which arise for construction under section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act may be described as "mixed questions of law and fact—a phrase not unhappy if it carries with it the warning that in so far as it depends upon fact the finding of the Court of first appeal must be accepted" (k). Without seeking to abridge the effect of sections 100 and 101 of the Code of Civil Procedure or weaken the strict rule that on second appeal the Appellate Court is bound by the findings of fact of the Court below, "the facts found need not be questioned. It is the soundness of the conclusion from them that is in question and this is a matter of law." Thus remarked the Privy Council (l) which pointed out elsewhere (m) that "questions of law and fact are sometimes difficult to disentangle. The proper legal effect of a proved fact is essentially a question of law." Unless there has been misconstruction a mistaken inference from documents is an error not of law but of fact (n). When the facts proved were that the transfer was with intent to defraud, the consideration was not proved, and the transferee could not plead good faith, it was held these were questions of fact and in second appeal it was not open to the appellant to question these findings (o). A contrary view has been taken by the Court of the Judicial Commissioner at Nagpur, namely, that a second appeal lies (p).

Third parties.—The benefit of the statute has been extended where the transferee makes payment not for his own benefit but for the benefit of the settlor's family or wife or child resulting in the withdrawal from the creditors of all the settlor's property. Although the circumstances shew an intent to defeat or delay if there were nothing more and if it were the settlor's spontaneous act, nevertheless, when taken with other circumstances and the evidence shews that the condition on which the settlement was made had never occurred to the settlor till made, there is no intention to defeat or delay and particularly so where the parties who took part in the transaction were not aware of any other debts besides the one about to be paid (q).

Laches.—The defence of delay is not effectual. The creditor has a legal right which cannot be lost by mere delay to enforce it, unless the delay is such as to cause a statutory bar (r).

Costs.—On avoidance of settlement trustees who have acted properly in discharge of their duties and not put plaintiff to unnecessary expense are entitled to attorney and client costs (u). Where a cestui que trust was concerned, a decree without costs was made (v). In another creditor's action his costs were given priority over the debts of the testator and the costs of the trustees (w).

Interlocutory injunction.—The Court has power to grant an interim injunction quia timet brought by an execution creditor under Order 39, rule 1 (b) of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, but will not at the instance of a non-judgment-creditor interfere by an injunction to prevent a transfer of the property by debtor unless interference is warranted by the application of Order 38, rule 5. Nor would the Court to protect the wife's right to alimony restrain the husband from removing the property quia timet (x). The doctrine of lis pendens would not apply, for in a petition for maintenance there is no dispute as to the rights to the property of the husband.

To restrain dealings with property no injunction can be granted until the plaintiff has under Order 39, rule 1 (b) of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1908, proved by definite evidence that the defendant threatened or intended to remove or dispose of his property with a view to defraud his creditors (y). A testator voluntarily assigned two policies of insurance to his niece who received the moneys on his death and invested them on mortgage with other moneys of her own. The Court exacted an undertaking from the assignee not to receive the moneys secured (z). And where a receiver has been appointed at the instance of a judgment-creditor an injunction will be granted against the assignee receiving the debtor's property (a).

Form of decree in setting aside deeds partially, viz., as against creditors only.—Declare that the indentures are void as against the plaintiff and all other creditors of the defendant and order the defendant to join in and concur in all necessary acts, conveyances, etc., for the purpose of raising the amount due to the plaintiff and all other creditors, out of the estates, and the rents; direct an account to be taken of the rents. The defendant to pay the costs (c).

Partition after decree obtained against the father.—It has been laid down that the sons of a Hindu father at any time upto attachment of the joint family property can enter into a partition with their father with the express object of avoiding attachment of what upto the time of the partition has been the joint family property. If they do so their individual property acquired by the partition escapes liability. In order, however, to rid himself of his liability to pay his father's debt the partition by the son must take place before the property has been actually attached. The partition can only be set aside on evidence shewing fraud and the mere fact of the desire to save their property will not be sufficient to justify an inference of fraud (d).

Subsequent transferee.—Sub-section 2 of section 53 deals with transfers made without consideration with intent to defraud a subsequent transferee. As explained in the statement of objects and reasons for amendment of the section, the law in England relating to transfers made with intent to defraud subsequent transferee for value was altered by section 2 of the Voluntary Conveyances Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 21) by which it was provided that a voluntary conveyance if made bona fide and without fraudulent intent should not be deemed fraudulent within the meaning of 27 Eliz., c. 4, by reason of any subsequent purchase for value. Section 2 of the Voluntary Conveyances Act was repealed by section 173 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. Clause 2 of sub-section 2, following the rule in section 173, sub-section 2, enacts that the mere existence of a subsequent transfer for consideration shall not by itself be evidence that a previous transfer made without consideration was made with intent to defraud. The section deals with transfers by act inter vivos so that a person who steps in by operation of law and not by any act of the owner is not subsequent transferee within the meaning of this sub-section (e). The section is silent as to the rights of a transferee impaired by such a transaction.

Transfer fraudulent against purchasers.—Section 53, sub-section (2) has been enacted for the protection of the purchasers just as sub-section (1) has been enacted for the benefit of the creditors. Originally founded upon the statute 27 Eliz., c. 4, to which was added a proviso similar to clause (2) of sub-section (2) by the Voluntary Conveyances Act, 1893, repealed by the Law of Property Act, 1925, and substituted by section 173 of that Act, it runs as follows :—

(1) Every voluntary disposition of land made with intent to defraud a subsequent purchaser is voidable at the instance of that purchaser.

(2) For the purposes of this section, no voluntary disposition, whenever made, shall be deemed to have been made with intent to defraud by reason only that a subsequent conveyance for valuable consideration was made, if such subsequent conveyance was made after the twenty-eighth day of June, eighteen hundred and ninety-three.

Voluntary conveyance.—The object of enacting sub-section (2) is somewhat difficult to understand for cases contemplated can hardly arise in this country. Every voluntary transfer as contemplated by the section is compulsorily registrable both under the Indian Registration Act as also under section 123 of the Transfer of Property Act so that registration would be notice to the subsequent transferee. Founded on 27 Eliz., c. 4, and the Voluntary Conveyances Act, 1893, repealed and re-enacted as section 173 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, the fact that England is not like India universally registrable seems to have been overlooked and this is one of the reasons why there has been no decision on the subject in this country upto the present time. The distinction between good and valuable consideration is this, that the former is good between the parties but the latter makes the transfer good against a subsequent transferee (f). When consideration is good a conveyance is not fraudulent under statute 27 Eliz., c. 4, though made secretly and kept concealed (g). The statute binds the fraudulent grantor and persons claiming under him as volunteers. A purchaser from the devisee of one who has made a voluntary transfer in his lifetime was not entitled under the statute 27 Eliz., c. 4, to avoid

S. 53 the voluntary transfer (h). The voluntary transfer under this sub-section is voidable at the option of the transferee who may claim specific performance of the contract (i). The transferor cannot (j), nor can he resist the transferee's demand for the return of the deposit (k). An assignment of a leasehold is not a voluntary conveyance within the statute (l) even though the consideration be natural love and affection (m) but such an assignment will not support a concurrent conveyance of freehold (n). A post-nuptial settlement in pursuance of an ante-nuptial arrangement is not a voluntary settlement (o), otherwise if the agreement be parol (p), the transferee who claims benefit under this section must be bona fide transferee for value and not for inadequate consideration.

Not a subsequent transferee.—Having regard to the preamble as well as section 5 of the Transfer of Property Act, a purchaser at a Court auction who steps in by operation of law and not by any act of the owner is not a subsequent transferee within the meaning of section 53, sub-section (2) (q).

Persons who may impeach.—Only purchasers for value who come in after the fraudulent conveyance can avoid. Indirectly it enables a settlor to defeat a settlement made by him by letting in a subsequent purchaser for value. A mortgagee is a purchaser within the statute (r). A lessee at a rack rent is a purchaser for valuable consideration (s). So is an equitable mortgagee by deposit of title-deeds (t) and chargee (u).

Persons whose title may not be impeached.—The title of a purchaser for valuable consideration cannot be defeated by a prior voluntary settlement of which he had no notice though he purchased of one who had obtained a conveyance by fraud, but of which fraud he the purchaser was ignorant (v).

Effect of notice of prior grant.—A purchaser who previously to the contract had notice that a settlement of the subject-matter thereof (though not founded on any valuable consideration) had been made and was then in force, is disentitled to specific performance (w). According to English decisions a voluntary conveyance is void against a subsequent purchaser under 27 Eliz., c. 4, whether with or without notice (x), though Butterfield v. Heath (y), disapproved in In re Foster and Lister (z) on another point, decided that a purchaser must take a title though depending on the invalidity of a voluntary conveyance as against a purchaser for valuable consideration with notice.

Specific performance of contract to sell by voluntary settlor.—A vendor who previous to entering into the contract has made a settlement (though not founded on any valuable consideration) of the subject-matter of the contract is not entitled performance adopted and followed by the Courts in India." In doing so, however, it seems that the Indian Legislature has by one sweeping stroke tried to override several other positive enactments. This is bound to result in an unsatisfactory working of the present section. The English doctrine of part performance arose out of the Statute of Frauds which required contracts relating to lands, in writing. When not reduced to writing, Courts of Equity in England did not permit the statute to be made an instrument of fraud. So that in spite of the absence of writing, it regarded the contract as executed and gave relief. In India section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act required a transfer of immoveable property to be not only in writing but also to be registered. The present section enacts that an instrument in writing relating to immoveable property could be admitted in evidence though not registered. In England the law of registration does not apply. The English doctrine may be said to be an encroachment on the Statute of Frauds and the Indian doctrine an encroachment on the law of registration. The first supplies the omission of the written contract, the second cures the defect of registration. The English doctrine is wider as letting in parol evidence, where writing is required. In India section 92 of the Evidence Act was a bar to such parol evidence being admitted. In England the doctrine of part performance is applied to any act of part performance, which is shewn to have been performed by the defendant, whereas under the present section, the taking of possession or the continuing in possession, if already in possession, by the transferee must be in part performance of the contract. Further, the section not only attempts to get over the want of registration of a deed but also any act necessary for its completion, as where a document was required to be attested, non-attestation would not render the document void. In enacting that want of registration shall not enable the transferor to enforce against the transferee any other right than that expressly provided by the terms of the contract, the framers of the Act seem to have overlooked the provisions of sections 23 and 25 of the Registration Act. For in case of an instrument of transfer, the deed must be registered within the time prescribed by those sections. Again, in India no contract of immoveable property requires registration, so that this subject of the law of transfer of immoveable property is distinctly at an advantage by the enactment of this section. If a contract is not in writing but the transferee has taken possession, and done acts in furtherance of the contract, the doctrine of part performance is not to be applied. On this subject it seems that the law as existing prior to the enactment of section 53A, would apply. In England the doctrine of part performance was applied because the Statute of Charles II required writing in case of transfer of interest in land and Courts of Equity applied the doctrine, when there was no writing, and to refuse relief would be to enable the parties to be charged to commit a fraud. In India writing is insisted upon by the section, so that the English doctrine of part performance is now the reverse of section 53A. The Indian Legislature in effect, enacts the Statute of Frauds which so far as it relates to interest in land has been repealed and re-enacted by the Law of Property Act of 1925, but the later Act has taken care to exclude part performance by section 40, sub-section (2).

The enactment with its additional legislation.—Introduced into the Act by section 16 of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act (20 of 1929) to give statutory recognition to the equitable doctrine of part performance as understood by the English Courts in Lester v. Foxcroft (f), exhaustively dealt with in Maddison v.

(f) Colles. Par. Cas., 108, 1 E. R., 205.

Alderson (g) and, adopted by the Privy Council in Mahomed Musa's case (h), it has been found necessary by the Legislature to add section 27A to the Specific Relief Act, I of 1877, and a saving clause to section 49 of the Indian Registration Act, XVI of 1908.

Section not exhaustive.—Section 53A applies the doctrine of part performance to cases within its scope. The section is not exhaustive and there are still a number of cases which would be outside the section, to which the English Law of part performance would apply.

Retrospective effect of the section.—Decisions of the High Court on this subject are not uniform. The Madras (i), Allahabad (j), Nagpur (k) and Bombay (l) High Courts have held that it is not. The Patna High Court appears to hold that the section does not apply to pending actions (m), while the Bombay High Court has applied it to a suit instituted before it came into operation (n). The Allahabad High Court has applied the new section to a case started after it came into force (o). The Calcutta High Court, while assuming that it was retrospective, held that it did not apply to pending actions (p). Its omission from section 63 of the Amending Act, XX of 1929, and the case of Young v. Adams (q), has led to diversity of opinion. That it is not retrospective as to pending actions is supported by the observations of the Judicial Committee in Pir Baksh's case (r). As to how far a statute is retrospective, reference may be made to the commentaries on the preamble and the undermentioned cases (s).

Transactions to which section 53A does not apply.—Section 53A does not apply to the following transactions :—

- (1) To contracts without consideration.
- (2) To moveable property.
- (3) To verbal transfers.
- (4) To a transfer the terms of which cannot be ascertained with reasonable certainty.
- (5) To transfers, where the transferee has not obtained possession of the property or any part thereof, or being already in possession continues in possession and has not done some act which would constitute an act of part performance.
- (6) Where the transferee has not performed or is not willing to perform his part of the contract.
- (7) To a right other than a right expressly provided by the terms of the contract.
- (8) Where it would affect a transferee for consideration who has no notice of the contract.

Statute of Frauds (t).—Equity Courts applied the doctrine of part performance to prevent section 4 of this statute being made an instrument of fraud. The section provided: "And be it further enacted that from and after the said 24th day of June, no action shall be brought whereby to charge any executor or administrator upon any special promise, to answer damages out of his own estate; or whereby to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default or miscarriages of another person, or to charge any person upon any agreement made upon consideration or marriage; or upon any contract or sale of lands, tenements or hereditaments or any interest in or concerning them or upon any agreement that is not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof; unless the agreement upon such action shall be brought or some memorandum or note thereof shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorized." The words in italics have been repealed by the Law of Property Act, 1925 (u).

Law of Property Act, 1925 (v).—The words of the Statute of Frauds "or upon any contract or sale of lands, tenements or hereditaments or any interest in or concerning them" were repealed and re-enacted by section 40 of this Act which is as follows:—

(1) No action may be brought upon any contract for the sale or other disposition of land or any interest in land, unless the agreement upon which such action is brought, or some memorandum or note thereof is in writing, and signed by the party to be charged or by some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorized.

(2) This section applies to contracts whether made before or after the commencement of this Act, and does not affect the law relating to part performance, or sale by the Court.

The grounds and established limits of the equitable doctrine of part performance.—It is not easy to ascertain from the authorities earlier than the case of Maddison v. Alderson (w) what precisely was the ground of the equitable doctrine as to part performance. In that case the Lord Chancellor the Earl of Selbourne exhaustively dealt with the subject. The appellant in that case lived for many years as house-keeper in the service of Thomas Alderson who died on the 16th December 1877. She originally entered his service in 1845 and having become his house-keeper some years before 1863, continued to serve him in that capacity down to the time of his death. He was, when he died, the owner in fee simple of a freehold estate of Moulton in Yorkshire called the Manor House Farm. It is certain that he intended to leave the appellant (subject to a small annuity) a life-interest in the estate, for he had a will prepared for that purpose in 1872, which he signed in 1874, and which only failed for want of due attestation. The appellant had possessed herself of the title-deeds, and the heir-at-law to whom the estate descended, brought the present action to recover them. Her defence was that she was entitled to the same benefit which she would have taken under the will if duly executed, by virtue of the parol agreement, alleged to have been made with her by her master for sufficient consideration and to have been on her part performed. The question which went to the jury was "whether the defendant was induced to serve Thomas Alderson as his housekeeper, without wages for many years and to give up other prospects of establishment in life by a promise, made by him to her, to make a will leaving her a life estate in Moulton Manor Farm, if and when it became his property." That question the jury answered in the affirmative. Mr. Justice Stephen and the Court of Appeal arrived at the conclusion that the contract was proved in this case on which, but for the Statute of Frauds, the appellant might have been entitled to relief; but they differed on the question of part performance, Mr. Justice Stephen, thinking that part performance was sufficient to take the case out of the Statute of Frauds, the Court of Appeal thinking otherwise. This made it necessary for the House of Lords to examine the doctrine of equity as to part performance or parol contracts, as to which Lord Selbourne observed, "The cases upon the subject (which are very numerous) are all or which nearly all have arisen upon the words of the fourth section of the Statute of Frauds, which provided that 'no action shall be brought to charge any person upon any contract or sale of lands, etc.' It has recently been decided by the Court of Appeal in Britain v. Rossiter (x) that the equity of part performance does not extend and ought not to be extended to contracts concerning any subject-matter other than land. . . . " That equity has been stated by high authority to rest upon the principle of fraud. "Courts of Equity will not permit the statute to be made an instrument of fraud. . . ." "It has been determined at law (and, in this respect there can be no difference between law and equity) that the fourth section of the Statute of Frauds does not avoid parol contracts but only bars the legal remedies by which they might otherwise have been enforced." Crosby v. Wadsworth (y), Leroux v. Brown (z), Britain v. Rossiter (a). "From the law thus stated the equitable consequences of part performance of a parol contract concerning land, seem to me naturally to result. In a suit founded on such part performance, the defendant is really charged upon the equities resulting from the acts done in execution of the contract, and not (within the meaning of the statute) upon the contract itself. If such equities were excluded, injustice of a kind which the statute cannot be thought to have had in contemplation, would follow. Let the case be supposed of a parol contract to sell land, completely performed on both sides as to everything except conveyance; the whole purchase-money paid; the purchaser put into possession; expenditure by him (say, in costly buildings) upon the property; leases granted by him to tenants. The contract is not a nullity; there is nothing in the statute to estop any Court which may have to exercise jurisdiction in the matter, from inquiring into and taking notice of the truth of the facts. All the acts done must be referred to the actual contract, which is the measure and test of their legal and equitable character and consequences. If, therefore, in such a case a conveyance were refused and an action of ejectment brought by the vendor or his heir against the purchaser, nothing could be done towards ascertaining and adjusting the equitable rights and liabilities of the parties, without taking the contract into account. The matter has advanced beyond the stage of contract; and the equities which arise out of the stage which it has reached, cannot be administered unless the contract is regarded. The choice is between

S. 53A undoing what has been done (which is not always possible, or if possible, just) and completing what has been left undone. The line may not always be capable of being so clearly drawn as in the case supposed; but it is not arbitrary or unreasonable to hold that when the statute says that no action is to be brought to charge any person upon a contract concerning land, it has in view the simple case in which he is charged upon the contract only, and not that in which there are equities resulting from res gestæ subsequent to and rising out of the contract. So long as the connection of those res gestæ with the alleged contract does not depend upon mere parol testimony, but is reasonably to be inferred from the res gestæ themselves, justice seems to require some such limitation of the scope of the statute, which might otherwise interpose an obstacle even to the rectification of material errors, however clearly proved in an executed conveyance founded upon an unsigned agreement."

Earlier than Lester v. Foxcroft (b) was the case of Butcher v. Stapely (c), in which Lord Guilford "declared that inasmuch as possession was delivered according to the agreement he took the bargain to be executed." This must have been the principle on which the House of Lords proceeded in 1701 when it reversed the decree of Lord Somers in Lester v. Foxcroft (d). In that case the appellant stated that Foxcroft was seised of an ancient messuage called "Wildhouse" and possessed of other parts thereof for a long term of years, and agreed with several builders to pull down parts thereof and build new houses thereon. He proposed to make such agreement on the 25th March 1695 for part of the said house with appellant, promising to assist him with money without interest, should he want to complete the building. It was particularly agreed between them that the appellant should at his own cost, pull down a certain part of the messuage and build thereon 14 or more good messuages and in consideration thereof, Foxcroft should lease the said part to him for 99 years at £150 a year. There was no memorandum or note thereof in writing, but in performance of the agreement, appellant entered into that part of the messuage and at his own cost pulled down the same and built the whole 14 and almost finished them, expending thereon £2,000 of his own money and other sums borrowed from Foxcroft. The appellant was all along in possession, acted as sole proprietor and owner and was acknowledged as such by Foxcroft who frequently declared that he had only a ground rent, and that the appellant was the landlord. The appellant demised the same in his own name and received the rents. In 1698 Foxcroft made his will and devised to his second son Issac all his estate in the said ancient messuage called "Wildhouse"; he delivered the will to the appellant's wife to let the appellant see that there was nothing therein inconsistent with the said agreement, and ordered her to get a lease prepared speedily. He, however, died without executing the same, and the respondent refused to execute the lease according to the agreement, and the appellant brought his bill which was dismissed without any relief; he appealed against this decree which was reversed by the House of Lords who ordered the respondent to execute such a lease of the premises in question as was prepared and approved of by the father before his death and that the appellant should hold and enjoy the premises under the covenants and agreements in the said intended lease, discharged of all encumbrances created by Foxcroft and his heirs. The Lord Chancellor further proceeded: "Among later cases I may refer to Pengall v. Ross (e), decided by Lord Cowper in 1709; Lockey v.

Lockey (f) by Lord Macclesfield in 1718; and Potter v. Potter (g) by Strange, Master of the Rolls, in 1750." "There must be something," said Lord Cowper (h), "more than a bare payment of money on the one part to induce the Court to decree a specific performance on the other part, either by putting it out of the party's power to undo the thing, or where it would be a prejudice to the party performing his part, as beginning to build, or letting the other into possession, etc. In such case, where the agreement has proceeded so far on one part, the statute never intended to restrain this Court from decreeing a performance of the other." Lord Macclesfield said (i) that an unwritten agreement "if executed on one part, had always been looked upon as so far conclusive as to induce the Court to decree an execution on the other part, not to destroy or avoid the agreement so far as it was already carried into execution." Sir John Strange (j) said, "if confessed or in part carried into execution, it will be binding on the parties, and carried into further execution as such, in equity."

The doctrine, however, so established has been confined by Judges of the greatest authority within limits intended to prevent a recurrence of the mischief, which the statute was passed to suppress.

Lord Hardwicke, in Gunter v. Halsey (k), said: "As to the acts done in performance, they must be such as could be done with no other view or design than to perform the agreement" ("the terms of which," he added, "must be certainly proved"). "He thought it indeed consistent with that rule to treat the payment of purchase-money, in whole or in part, as a sufficient part performance: Lacon v. Mertins (l), Owen v. Davies (m). This Lord Cowper in Pengall v. Ross (n) and Lord Macclesfield in Seagood v. Meale (o) had refused to do. On that point later authorities have overruled Lord Hardwicke's opinion and it may be taken as now settled that part payment of purchase-money is not enough; and Judges of high authority have said the same even of payment in full: Clinan v. Cooke (p), Hughes v. Morris (q), Britain v. Rossiter (r). "Some of the reasons which have been given for that conclusion are not satisfactory; the best explanation of it seems to be, that the payment of money is an equivocal act, not (in itself), until the connection is established by parol testimony, indicative of a contract concerning land. I am not aware of any case, in which the whole purchase-money has been paid without delivery of possession, nor is such a case at all likely to happen. All the authorities shew that the acts relied upon as part performance must be unequivocally, and in their own nature, referable to some such agreement as that alleged"; Cooth v. Jackson (s), Frame v. Dawson (t), Morphett v. Jones (u). "The acknowledged possession" (said Sir T. Plumer in Morphett v. Jones (u)) "of a stranger in the land of another is not explicable, except on the supposition of an agreement, and has therefore constantly been received as evidence of an antecedent contract and as sufficient to authorize an inquiry into the terms, the Court regarding what has been done as a consequence of contract or tenure."

"It is in general," said Sir James Wigram (Dale v. Hamilton) (v) "of the essence of such an act that the Court shall by reason of the act itself, without knowing whether there was an agreement or not, find the parties unequivocally in a position different from that which, according to their legal rights, they would be in, if there were no contract....” See also Britain v. Rossiter (w) per Lord Justice Cotton. The acts of part performance exemplified in the long series of decided cases in which parol contracts concerning land have been enforced, have been almost if not quite universally relative to the possession, use or tenure of land. The law of equitable mortgage by deposit of title-deeds is upon the same principles.

Examples of circumstances which have been held insufficient for this purpose are found in Clerk v. Wright (x) and Whaley v. Bagenal (y), where acts preparatory to completion of a contract, were held not to be part performance; in Wills v. Stradling (z), where the mere holding over by a tenant (unless qualified by the payment of a different rent) was held not to be enough “even to call for an answer”; in Lamas v. Bayley (a), where the plaintiff being engaged in a treaty for the purchase of land, desisted in order that the defendant might buy it, on agreement that he should have part of it when so bought at a proportionate price, but his “desisting from the prosecution of his purchase,” was held to be no part performance; and in O’Reilly v. Thompson (b), where the agreement alleged was, that upon the plaintiff obtaining from a third party a release of a right to a lease claimed by him, the defendant would grant to the plaintiff a lease of the same premises on certain terms....

“.... The law deducible from these authorities is, in my opinion, fatal to the appellant’s case. Her mere continuance in Thomas Alderson’s service, though without any actual payment of wages, was not such an act as to be in itself evidence of a new contract, much less of a contract concerning her master’s land. It was explicable without supposing any such new contract as easily as the continuance of a tenant in possession after the expiration of a lease. The relinquishment of any chance which she might have had of marriage was of no greater force than the relinquishment of the treaty for purchase in Lamas v. Bayley (c). The alleged acts of part performance preceded, and therefore could not be evidence of, any contract on her part; there performance was [as in O’Reilly v. Thompson (d)] a condition precedent, without the fulfilment of which the promise which the jury found to have been made by Thomas Alderson could not on his part become a binding contract.” This doctrine cannot be made use of for the purpose of obtaining damages in substitution for or in addition to specific performance, when specific performance has become barred (e). In In re a Bankruptcy notice (f), Aitken, L.J., observed that, “the doctrine applied to contracts relating to an interest in land.” The subject was recently reviewed by Romer, J., in Robinson v. Ames (g).

The principle in Walsh v. Lonsdale (h).—Closely resembling the equity in Maddison v. Alderson (i) is the principle of equity enunciated in Walsh v. Lonsdale (h). By an agreement of 29th May 1879, the defendant agreed to grant to the plaintiff a lease of a mill for seven years at the rent of 30s. a year for each loom run, the plaintiff not to run less than 540 looms. The lease was to contain such stipulations as were embodied in a certain lease of the 1st May, according to which the rent was fixed and made payable in advance. The plaintiff was let into possession, but paid rent quarterly and not in advance. In March 1882 the defendant demanded payment of certain moneys including, inter alia, a whole year's rent payable in advance, and put in a distress. Upon this the plaintiff commenced his action claiming damages for improperly distraining, an injunction to restrain defendant from selling under the distress and from continuing in possession and specific performance of the agreement for a lease. Fry, J., granted the injunction on the terms of the plaintiff paying £1,005-14-0 into Court. The plaintiff appealed. Jessell, M. R., said: "There is an agreement for a lease under which possession has been given. Now since the Judicature Act, the possession is held under the agreement. There are not two estates as there were formerly, one estate at common law by reason of the payment of the rent from year to year, and an estate in equity under the agreement. There is only one Court, and the equity rules prevail in it. The tenant holds under an agreement for a lease. He holds, therefore, under the same terms in equity as if a lease had been granted, it being a case in which both parties admit that relief is capable of being given by specific performance. That being so, he cannot complain of the exercise by the landlord of the same rights as the landlord would have had, if a lease had been granted. On the other hand, he is protected in the same way as if a lease had been granted; he cannot be turned out by six months' notice as a tenant from year to year. He has a right to say 'I have a lease in equity and you can only re-enter if I have committed such a breach of covenant as would, if a lease had been granted, have entitled you to re-enter according to the terms of a proper proviso for re-entry.' That being so, it appears to me that being a lease in equity, he cannot complain of the exercise of the right of distress merely because the actual parchment has not been signed and sealed." Although it has been suggested that the decision in Walsh v. Lonsdale (j) takes away all difference between the legal and equitable estate, it, of course, does nothing of the sort, and the limits of its applicability are really somewhat narrow. It applies only to cases where there is a contract to transfer a legal title, and an act has to be justified or an action maintained by force of the legal title to which such contract relates. It involves two questions, (1) Is there a contract of which specific performance can be obtained? (2) If yes, will the title acquired by such specific performance justify at law the act complained of or support at law the action in question? It is to be treated as though before the Judicature Acts there had been, first a suit in equity for specific performance, and then an action at law between the same parties; and the doctrine is applicable only in those cases where specific performance can be obtained between the same parties in the same Court, and at the same time as the subsequent legal question falls to be determined (k). Thus, in Walsh v. Lonsdale (l), the landlord under an agreement for a lease for a term of seven years distrained. Distress is a legal remedy and depends on the existence at law of the relation of landlord and tenant: but the agreement between the same parties, if specifically enforced, created that relation. It was clear that such an agreement would be enforced in the same Court and between the same parties; the act of distress was therefore held to be lawful.

The principle in Maddison v. Alderson different from the principle in Walsh v. Lonsdale.—There is a wide distinction between Maddison v. Alderson (m) and

Walsh v. Lonsdale (n) so far as the practical application of the principles which they respectively lay down, is concerned. According to the former, part performance of a contract may give rise to equities which complete the contract, and it will then assume the character of a contract already executed and on the footing of that executed contract, all the equities of the case may be adjusted; on the other hand, there may be cases where to give the necessary reliefs to the parties, a legal right, may have to be established and for the purpose of establishment of that legal right, it may be necessary to invoke the aid of the later case. In other words, if a defendant can bring his action in ejectment within Maddison v. Alderson (o), he need not resort to Walsh v. Lonsdale (p) as the former case gives him higher rights, making unnecessary for him to have specific performance, so that Walsh v. Lonsdale (p) can help a defendant provided his right to specific performance is not barred whilst Maddison v. Alderson (o) can be resorted to even if specific performance is barred. Unfortunately the two cases, or rather the principles which they seek to propound, have been considerably mixed up in reported decisions in this country, especially of the Calcutta High Court, and it is on account of misconception of the principles, which these cases respectively lay down that there is a considerable divergence of judicial opinion, whether or not a person who is in possession in performance or part performance of a contract, may successfully resist an action in ejectment, when his right to specific performance of the contract is already barred by efflux of time. In the case of a defendant who has come to be in possession, in performance or part performance of a contract and who is sought to be ejected, there seems to be now a concurrence amongst the High Courts of Allahabad, Bombay and Madras, that notwithstanding that the right of the defendant to enforce performance was barred at the date of the suit, the performance affords a good defence to the action. With reference to these two equities a Full Bench of the Madras High Court observed that these two defences though sometimes they may coincide, are in essence logically distinct (q). It is respectfully submitted that these two defences cannot coincide, for the defence of the equity in Walsh v. Lonsdale (r) is dependant upon the possession of a proved right to specific performance, while the defence in Maddison v. Alderson (s) can be resorted to when there is part performance of the contract, as would take the case out of the operation of the present statute. They further observed, "What the statute enacts is that a document of title to land—a conveyance, in short—can only acquire validity, can only in fact be provable, on registration. So far from forbidding unregistered contracts for the sale of land, it expressly recognizes their existence, denying to them only the creation of an interest in or charge upon the land itself and, therefore, leaving their contractual effect as between the parties to the contract, unimpaired." In overruling Ramanathan v. Ranganathan (t) and the earlier Full Bench case of Kurri Veerareddi v. Kurri Bapireddi (u), the learned Judges said that the learned Judges who decided the earlier case, laboured under the same misconception as those whose opinion prevailed in the later one. "They treated a prohibition of unregistered conveyances as being a prohibition of unregistered contracts, and neglected a very clear expression of opinion to the contrary in the Privy Council case of Immudipattam Thirugnana Kondama Naik v. Periya Dorasami (v) as being an obiter dictum. Strictly speaking, that may be so; it is sufficient for us to say

Growth in India of the doctrine of part performance.—Prior to 1914 the Indian authorities are much in conflict, as to the application of the doctrine of part performance; it would therefore not be profitable to examine them in detail. In 1914, however, the applicability of the doctrine to India was examined by the Privy Council in Mahomed Musa v. Aghore Kumar Ganguli (x), a case before the Transfer of Property Act was enacted. In that case a mortgage was granted by one Fuzlul Karim in 1848 and a conveyance was made to his wife, Khodajanessa, of her husband's zemindari as a gift in lieu of dower. In 1870 a certain agreement was executed by Khodajanessa and the three sons of Ram Chund Mukerji, the mortgagee under the agreement of 1848, in reference to that mortgage. On April 4, 1871, the second mortgage was granted. In 1873 differences arose between Khodajanessa and the mortgagees, who brought a suit to enforce against her the agreement come to. This suit was compromised whereby the three sons of the mortgagee took a twelve annas share and the rest was taken by Khodajanessa. A decree was made on the compromise, which was never registered nor were the transfers contemplated by the compromise, ever executed. The point which was made against giving effect to this compromise, was that a conveyance was not made by Khodajanessa in completion of the contract of purchase, mentioned in the compromise. This was true. But no written conveyance by the Law of India was at the date of that transaction necessary, the Transfer of Property Act not being passed until the year 1882. It was, however, observed that even if a transfer in writing had been omitted or if some other formal defect had occurred, this would have been unavailing to redeem the mortgages for the compromise had been acted upon by all the parties to it, and the property dealt with on the footing of that division, of the extinction of the mortgage debts and of the receipt and enjoyment of rents and profits accordingly. In short, for a period of 30 to 40 years the parties had acted upon the footing as if a conveyance parting with the equity of redemption had been executed. In delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, Lord Shaw referred to the conclusion arrived at in Maddison v. Alderson (y) by Lord Selbourne as follows :—

"In a suit founded on such part performance (and the part performance referred to was that of a parol contract concerning land) the defendant is really charged upon the equities, resulting from the acts done in execution of the contract and not (within the meaning of the Statute of Frauds) upon the contract itself. If such equities were excluded, injustice of a kind which the statute cannot be thought to have had in contemplation, would follow." The Courts in India regarded this decision as based on the English equitable doctrine of part performance but the compromise agreement was a good executory agreement to transfer the right to redeem and at the date thereof a transfer of immoveable property could be by parol. Further, the compromise agreement did not come within the agreement referred to in section 17 of the Registration Act, 1871. Its registration was optional under section 18, sub-section (4) of that Act. The provisions of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, section 92 did not apply, as it did not modify the mortgage-deeds, being only an agreement to transfer part of the property included therein.

The next case which requires to be noticed in connection with this doctrine is that of Lakshmi Venkayamma v. Venkata Narasimha Appa Rao (z), also decided by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. In that case, upon the marriage of the appellant in 1886, her aunt, a wealthy Hindu widow with whom she had resided since childhood, promised that if the appellant and her husband would reside with her, she would (inter alia) purchase unspecified immovable property for the appellant. The appellant and her husband accordingly resided with the aunt. In 1893 the aunt bought a village in her own name, but, as she stated, for the appellant. Dissatisfaction arose because it was not transferred to the appellant and the husband consequently ceased to reside with the aunt. The aunt in October 1893, wrote to the appellant, stating that the village had been purchased for the appellant and would be transferred to her upon the writer's death. The appellant and her husband thereafter resided with the aunt until the aunt's death in 1899. The Judicial Committee, while holding that the letter of October 1893 constituted a binding contract by the aunt, and that the appellant was entitled to possession of the village, observed that: "Another view of the case would lead precisely to the same result. It is this: Suppose the proof of the acceptance made to the Rani, that is to say, of an acceptance in terms, were considered to be defective, what is the situation of the parties in view of the actings of the plaintiff and her husband? Their Lordships are of opinion, looking to the demand for a definite proposal as a condition of the plaintiff and her husband staying on with the Rani, that their actings did take place upon the footing of the proposal so made and that they were known by Papamma to have taken and to be taking place on that footing. In these circumstances the objection that the contract itself was inchoate or incomplete cannot be maintained. The law in this sense was fully explained by Lord Selbourne in the case of Maddison v. Alderson (a), a judgment which was cited at some length by this Board in Mahomed Musa v. Aghor Kumar Ganguli (b). After such actings locus pœnitentiæ, or the power of resiling from an incomplete agreement or an unaccepted offer, is, to use language borrowed from the Law of Scotland and highly approved in the case referred to, barred by rei interventus which raises a personal exception, which excludes the plea of locus pœnitentiæ. As was stated in the judgment of the Board in Mahomed Musa's case, 'Their Lordships do not think that there is anything either in the law of India or of England inconsistent with it, but upon the contrary, that these laws follow the same rule.' "

In this case, however, the decision did not rest on the equitable doctrine of part performance, but that a valid contract had been made and was enforceable by the appellant. The decisions of the Indian Courts have been by no means unanimous. The Bombay, Allahabad and Madras view is that performance affords a good defence to the action, though the right to specific performance was barred at the date of the suit. In Calcutta the preponderance is in favour of the limited application of the doctrine, that is to say, in favour of the applicability of the doctrine only to those cases where at the date of the suit there is an enforceable right on the part of the defendant, not extinguished by efflux of time.

In an Allahabad case (c), the facts were these. In 1905 A sold property X with other property by a duly registered deed to B and B sold property Y with other property to A. Possession of items X and Y was, however, not transferred and shortly afterwards A and B agreed to exchange the two properties. No deed of exchange was executed but the parties remained in possession from 1905. In 1915 some of the heirs of B sued to recover property X from A in virtue of the sale deed of 1905. It was held that in the circumstances the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover. A Full Bench of the Madras High Court, overruling Ramanathan v Ranganathan (d) and the Full Bench case of Kurri Veerareddi v Kurri Bapireddi (e), held that part performance by way of delivery of possession and an enforceable right on the purchaser's part to specific performance are each good defences to an action of ejectment on the part of the vendor (f). The same view was adopted by the Bombay High Court (g).

In this state of the authorities Mukerji, J., of the Calcutta High Court discussed at considerable length the views of the different High Courts in Ariff v. Jadu Nath (h) that the defendant not having obtained a lease in conformity with the provisions of section 107 of the Transfer of Property Act, read with section 49 of the Registration Act, can resist ejectment only if the case can be brought within the range of one or other of these principles of equity which have been held to apply to this country (i), and came to the conclusion that the defendant could resist ejectment on the principles of Maddison v. Alderson (j). The Privy Council (k), however, reversed this judgment, observing that the citation of that set of cases of which Maddison v. Alderson (l) was a familiar example, was beside the mark. Their Lordships, referring to the cases of Mahomed Musa v. Aghore Kumar Ganguli (m) and Lakshmi Venkayamma v. Venkata Narsimha Appa Rao (n), observed, "Neither of these cases, as a decision, affects the case now under consideration by the Board."

Instances in which the doctrine of part performance as laid down in Maddison v. Alderson and explained in Mahomed Musa's case was applied.—In India the act of part performance is exemplified in a long series of decided cases in which parol contracts concerning land have been enforced. These have been relative to the possession or use of the land or to transfers not registered. The law of equitable mortgage by deposit of title-deeds depends upon the same principles. Circumstances which have been held sufficient for the purpose and to which the doctrine has been applied, are transfer by unregistered deed when possession was with the defendants (o); a compromise of a criminal offence followed by an unregistered transfer in favour of defendant already in possession (p); partition of immoveable property when members have enjoyed certain items as separate property (q); an agreement for sale still capable of specific performance when possession was given to the purchaser (r); where not only possession was given to the purchaser but the whole purchase-money was paid to the vendor and it was held that the vendor had no attachable interest (s); a transfer without written conveyance in execution of a decree (t), and an award (u) for dower; a written statement after marriage in pursuance of a parol agreement before marriage when the daughter

The principle was also applied where two undivided brothers became divided in status but kept the suit lands undivided from future partition by metes and bounds (d) ; and also to a claim for redemption. A Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court in a claim for pre-emption based upon a transaction which was a good sale under the Mahomedan Law but not according to the Transfer of Property Act, held that a right of pre-emption did arise as the rule of Mahomedan Law was to be applied. But Banerji, J., who formed the Bench, dissenting, held that no such claim could arise unless the sale had been effected according to the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act (e).

The rule in Walsh v. Lonsdale.—It has been already pointed out that, in the Calcutta High Court, as to the application of the equity of part performance, the preponderance of cases has been in favour of the limited application of the doctrine, namely, to those cases where at the date of the suit there is an enforceable right on the part of the defendant not extinguished by efflux of time. In applying the rule, the Calcutta High Court followed the rule in Walsh v. Lonsdale. As pointed out in Hari Pada v. Nirod Krishna (f), the result of these cases may be reached either by the application of the doctrine of part performance in Maddison v. Alderson (g) which was followed by the Judicial Committee in Mahomed Musa v. Aghore Kumar Gangule (h) or by application of the rule in Walsh v. Lonsdale (i). The rule in the latter case is of no greater efficacy unless the contract for renewal is valid and operative. For though on the assumption made in Secretary of State v. Forbes (j), Lanmia v. Mahomed Easin (k), Secretary of State v. Digamber (l), Secretary of State v. Sibaprasad (m), the position of a lessee, who has always been ready and willing to accept a renewal on proper terms, is the same in equity as if a proper lease had been granted, it is essential that the covenant for renewal should be such as may be specifically enforced. The rule in Walsh v. Lonsdale is based upon the maxim, "equity regards that as done which should have been done." The rule has been applied where in presence of an agreement to transfer property the intended transferee has taken possession though the requisite legal documents have not been executed and registered, as to which Mookerjee, J., observed, "It is now well established by a long series of decisions in this Court from Bibi Jawahir v. Chhattearpur (n) to Syamkisor v. Dines (o) and Haripada v. Nirod (p) that when in pursuance of an agreement to transfer property, the intended transferee has taken possession, though the requisite legal documents have not been executed and registered, the position is the same as if the documents had been executed, provided that specific performance can be obtained between the parties to the agreement in the same Court and at the same time as the subsequent legal question falls to be determined (q). A similar view was expressed in Ariff v. Jadunath (r) by the Privy Council in which their Lordships said, "they were in agreement with the High Court in the view that Walsh v. Lonsdale (s) has no application to this case owing to the fact that the respondent's right to enforce the verbal contract had been barred long ago, before the commencement of the present suit." The rule, however, has been held not to apply to a contract for a lease in excess of the transferor's power (t). It has been applied to an arrangement for lease accompanied by possession (u). The rule has also been applied to an exchange transaction (v). It was also applied to an oral sale (w). In all the above cases the application of the doctrine rested on the ground that specific performance was not barred. This principle was followed in cases without reference to the question whether the right to claim specific performance was or was not subsisting (x).

Section 53A conflicts with Walsh v. Lonsdale.—To invoke the aid of section 53A the contract must be in writing and possession must have been taken by the defendant in part performance of the contract or if already in possession the transferee must continue to be in possession in part performance of the contract and do some act in furtherance of the contract. But it is irrespective of the question whether the claim of the transferee to specific performance is barred or not. To invoke the aid of Walsh v. Lonsdale (y) it is necessary to shew that the defendant's right to specific enforcement is not barred. Again, under the section the contract must be in writing, whilst in applying the equity in Walsh v. Lonsdale the contract may be oral.

Classification of judicial opinion prior to section 53A.—Indian decisions before the section was introduced fall into one or other of the groups mentioned. The result of one group of cases may be reached by the application of the doctrine of part performance in Maddison v. Alderson; others were decided on the rule in Walsh v. Lonsdale based on the maxim "equity looks on that as done which ought to have been done." A third group is based on the fiduciary capacity of the vendor, whilst the solitary instance of a plaintiff seeking relief on the ground of part performance forms the fourth group. The first rests on the principle that no equitable doctrine could be invoked to contravene the plain provisions of a positive enactment. The remaining two groups are founded on estoppel and limitation. These naturally gave rise to considerable conflict of judicial decisions which the section is intended to remedy.

Groups I and II.—These have already been dealt with.

Group III. Vendor holding constructively in fiduciary character.—A third class of cases deals with the fiduciary aspect of the vendor's position and the impropriety of permitting him to succeed against his vendee in a suit for possession. Where a vendor has contracted to sell an immoveable property and has under the contract put the prospective vendee in possession, sues the latter in ejectment, he repudiates the contract if the vendee is willing to complete the purchase. He also repudiates the fiduciary obligation arising out of the contract and annexed to the ownership of the property and seeks to treat the vendee as trespasser (z). A similar view was adopted where the purchaser's right to obtain specific performance of the agreement to sell had become time-barred (a). The decisions of the Courts of Allahabad (b), Calcutta (c) and Rangoon (d) are to the same effect. The above view of the various High Courts in India has been exploded by the Privy Council holding that an averment of the existence of a contract of sale whether with or without an averment of possession following upon the contract is not a relevant defence to an action of ejectment in India (e).

Group IV.—Whether acts done by an owner on his own property can constitute part performance.—In England the doctrine of part performance applies equally to suits for specific performance as to defences raised in suits for possession. There acts done by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant have been considered to be sufficient acts of part performance taking the case out of the Statute of Frauds entitling the plaintiff to a judgment for specific performance (f). In India there is no occasion for a plaintiff to institute a suit for specific performance to rely upon this doctrine, as there is no statutory provision similar to the Statute of Frauds requiring an agreement to sell, mortgage or lease property to be in writing. But the doctrine was applied when the defendant by an unstamped writing agreed to sell two of his lands and a house to the plaintiff in consideration of adjustment of accounts between the parties and in pursuance of the agreement defendant handed over to the plaintiff possession of the lands and executed a stamped but unregistered sale deed. In a suit for specific performance by the plaintiff it was held that the agreement of sale having been confessed and in part carried into execution, the matter had advanced beyond the stage of contract and the equities which had arisen could not be administered unless the contract was regarded (g). By the addition of section 27A to the Specific Relief Act, I of 1877, a lessor is now entitled to claim specific performance in a case of part performance of a contract to lease.

Group V.—No equitable doctrine can contravene a statute or punitive enactment.—There is a fourth class of cases in which any such equity as has been Group VI.—The principle of estoppel cannot be invoked to evade the plain provisions of a statute (i).

Group VII.—Another group of cases which steers clear of an equitable doctrine and which cures all defects in the defendant's possession, or title is that which is based on limitation, for a 12 years' uninterrupted possession by defendant would give him a perfect title to the property.

Part performance under the section.—

I. Where any person makes a contract

- (i) To transfer for consideration
 - (a) Any immoveable property
 - (b) By writing signed by him or on his behalf.
- (ii) From which the terms necessary to constitute the transfer can be ascertained with reasonable certainty and

II. The transferee

- (a) Has taken possession of the property or any part thereof in part performance of the contract, or
- (b) Being already in possession continues in possession and has done some act in furtherance of the contract, and
- (c) Has performed or is willing to perform his part of the contract.

III. Then the transferor or any person claiming under him

- (a) Shall be debarred from enforcing against the transferee and persons claiming under him any right.
 - (i) In respect of the property of which the transferee has taken or continued in possession.
 - (ii) Other than a right expressly provided by the terms of the contract.

IV. Notwithstanding that

- (a) the contract though required to be registered has not been registered, or
- (b) where there is an instrument of transfer the transfer has not been completed in the manner prescribed therefor by the law for the time being in force.

Proviso.—Nothing in this section shall affect the rights of a transferee

- (i) for consideration
- (ii) who has no notice

 - (b) the part performance thereof.

S. 53A

It must be noted that the contract referred to in the section must be in writing but need not be registered. It is necessary, however, that the transferee should take possession of the property or any part thereof and that such possession must be attributable or referable to part performance of the contract on his part, and if he be in possession, such possession is not enough to invoke the doctrine but that he must do some act in furtherance of the contract. In either case the transferee must shew that he has performed or is willing to perform his part of the contract. The words "notwithstanding that the contract...for the time being in force" must be deemed to be in parenthesis.

Essential elements necessary for the application of the doctrine:—

- (1) that the transferee has been put in possession of the property,
- (2) that his possession can be referred to the particular transfer and not to any other relationship,
- (3) that it will amount to a fraud on the part of the transferor to back out of such transfer, and
- (4) that the terms of the transfer can be ascertained with reasonable certainty.

To what contracts applicable.—The equitable doctrine of part performance has not been confined to contracts relating to an interest in land. Probably it would apply to all cases in which the Court would entertain a suit for specific performance if the contract had been in writing (j) but not to a contract of service (k).

Sale by order of the Court.—To a judicial sale the statute is not applicable (l) though sales of land by auction are within the statute (m). Under the Law of Property Act, 1925, sales by Court are excluded from the operation of section 40 which repeals and re-enacts the Statute of Frauds so far as it required contracts relating to land to be in writing.

Voluntary transfers.—Founded upon consideration, the doctrine of part performance as enunciated in the section, excludes from its operation voluntary transfers, for no equity arises in favour of volunteers (n).

Any person contracts to transfer.—The section deals with contracts relating to the transfer of immoveable property, a stage antecedent to the actual "transfer of property" as defined in section 5 of the Act. It has been enacted for the benefit not of the transferor but of the transferee. As to what is a contract reference may be made to sections 2, 10, 11 and 25 and the Indian Contract Act, IX of 1872.

For consideration.—The contract must be supported by valuable consideration as defined in section 2 of the Indian Contract Act, IX of 1872. It therefore excludes gifts. Reference may be made to sections 10 and 25 of the said Act.

Writing signed by him or on his behalf.—The section requires that the contract shall be in writing. The Statute of Frauds and section 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, require a memorandum or note in writing signed by the party to be charged or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorized. Under the statute it has been held that an incomplete document referring to another containing terms may be connected together (o) and to constitute a complete contract two or more papers may be collected together (p). A written proposal signed by the party to be charged and assented to by the other party without writing is sufficient (q). Under the Transfer of Property Act, the contract may be signed on behalf of the transferor. The agent need not be authorized in writing (r), but such an agent cannot authorize another to sign (s). One of the contracting parties cannot sign as agent of the other (t). Again, section 53A requires the signature on the contract of the party to be charged therewith so that it is not necessary for the signature of the other party to be obtained (u). But it has been doubted whether in case of a contract signed only by one of the parties he is not at liberty to recede from it before the other party has done some act to bind himself (v).

The terms of the contract.—It is necessary that terms of the contract must not be uncertain or vague. They must be such as to be capable of being ascertained with reasonable certainty.

Possession.—To invoke the doctrine of part performance the transferee must take possession of the property or any part thereof and if he be already in possession and continues as such he must, in furtherance of the contract, do some act which must be such as to constitute an act of part performance. The acts of part performance, if they preceded the contract, could not be evidence of part performance, unless performance be a condition precedent without the fulfilment of which the promise could not be a binding contract (w).

1. Acts which constitute part performance.—The act done in performance must be such as to be done with no other view or design than to perform the agreement (x). They must be unequivocal and in their own nature referable to some such agreement as that alleged, the terms of which may then be proved by parol (y) and clearly referable to the contract (z). The acknowledged possession of a stranger in the land by another is received as evidence of antecedent contract justifying inquiry into the terms, the Court regarding what has been done as a consequence of the contract or tenure (a). As regards possession, the law is well established that if an intended purchaser is let into possession in pursuance of a parol contract, that is sufficient to prevent the Statute of Frauds being set up as a bar to the proof of the parol contract (b). The doctrine of part performance is founded on a change of possession which is assented to by that party to the contract who is sought to be charged. A tenant's possession and cultivation of the land would not sustain a parol agreement to purchase (c).

2. The Court must find the parties unequivocally in a position different from that which according to their legal rights they would be in, if there were no contract.

3. But the act, which though in truth done in pursuance of a contract admits of explanation without supposing a contract, is not in general admitted to constitute an act of part performance taking the case out of the Statute of Frauds, as, for example, the payment of a sum of money alleged to be purchase-money (d). Payment of purchase-money is not an act of part performance. An act though in truth done in pursuance of a contract is not in general admitted as an act of part performance to take the case out of the Statute of Frauds, as, for example, the payment of purchase-money (e). But where the purchase-money was paid by the wife and the husband was put into possession and for 10 years the moneys were retained by the father without payment of interest and the suit filed by the husband without payment of rent, it was held that the circumstances were sufficient acts of part performance (f). So also where the purchaser requested the vendor to give notice to quit to the tenants (g), and where the party seeking relief has expended money or otherwise acted in reliance of the execution of the agreement (h), but a release procured from an encumbrancer is not part performance (i), nor delivery of abstract of title-deeds (j) nor measurement on an agreement to exchange lands (k).

4. The acts of part performance should not precede unless it be a condition precedent without the fulfilment of which the promise cannot become a binding contract (l).

5. An act merely introductory or ancillary to the agreement though attended with expense is not part performance (m). The doctrine of part performance applies where there is an agreement between the parties and not to mere negotiations (n).

6. The matter has been summed up by Fry (o), that in order to constitute sufficient acts of part performance, all the requisite conditions set forth below and approved in Chaproniere v. Lambert (p) must be present.

First, the acts of part performance must be such as are not only referable to a contract such as that alleged but are referable, to no other title.

Secondly, they must be such as to render it a fraud in the defendant to take advantage of the contract not being in writing.

Thirdly, the contract to which they refer must be such as in its own nature is enforceable by the Court and Fourthly, there must be proper parol evidence of the contract which is let in by the acts of part performance.

The transferee has performed or is willing to perform his part of the contract.—To prevent a transferor impeaching the validity of the contract the transferee must, in addition to his having taken possession or being in possession and having done some act in furtherance of the contract, shew that he has performed or is willing to perform his part of the contract, for the ground of the doctrine is fraud in refusing to perform after performance by the other party (q).

Contract though required to be registered.—According to the section, non-registration does not prevent or preclude the transferee from enforcing his rights under a contract compulsorily registrable. The only contract required by law to be registered is an agreement for a lease creating a present demise. Neither contracts for sale nor a contract to lend money on mortgage requires registration. Section 49 of the Indian Registration Act, XVI of 1908, has been amended (r) to let in an unregistered document affecting immoveable property and required by that Act or the Transfer of Property Act to be registered as evidence of part performance of a contract for the purpose of section 53A of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882.

Transfer has not been completed.—Although the section starts with reference to contracts only, in the fourth paragraph reference is made to a transfer deed which is, however, a stage beyond the contract although there is no previous reference to the instrument of transfer. It enacts that although the instrument of transfer has not been completed in the manner required by law, still the transferor shall be debarred from enforcing against the transferee any right other than a right expressly provided by the terms of the contract. This would save an instrument which requires attestation if unattested, but not if it be unstamped.

Other than the right expressly provided by the terms of the contract.—The transferor cannot enforce, if the circumstances enumerated in the section are existing against the transferee, any right in respect of the property other than a right expressly provided by the terms of the contract.

Proviso.—The rule in the section does not apply to a transferee for valuable consideration :—

- (1) who has had no notice of the contract, or
- (2) who has had no notice of the part performance of the contract.

These exceptions are apt to lead to vexed questions of priority between registered and unregistered documents and also whether the subsequent transferee is with or without notice. Questions of priority between registered and unregistered documents are dealt with in section 50 of the Indian Registration Act, XVI of 1908, whereby documents mentioned in clauses (a), (b), (c) and (d) of sub-clause (1) of section 17 and clauses (a) and (b) of section 18, if duly registered, take effect as regards the property comprised therein against every unregistered document relating to the same property, and not being a decree or order, whether such unregistered document be of the same nature as the registered document or not. As to notice, reference may be made to section 3 of the Transfer of Property Act, IV of 1882.

Title of the transferee.—It must not be supposed that the section confers or is intended to confer a good title on the transferee (s). All that the section enacts is that the rights and liabilities arising under the contract as expressed in the written contract should be enforceable but no more, and that although on account of non-registration no title has passed, still by reason of part performance, rights have arisen which Courts of Law ought to recognize and enforce. In this view registration would still be necessary in order that the transferee may obtain a marketable title. But the title may be perfected by 12 years' adverse possession. The section does not confer title without registration for the provisions of section 54 and other sections of the Transfer of Property Act, which render registration compulsory must be complied with to perfect the title of the transferee. Although under the section the contract is required to be in writing no registration of that contract is compulsory. It makes enforceable a transaction which otherwise compulsorily registrable is not registered. As regards sale and mortgage contracts, they are not registrable, but in case of an agreement for a lease which creates a present demise, such an agreement requires not only to be in writing but also to be registered. If in performance of such an agreement the lessee takes possession, he may not sue for specific performance because he cannot prove the agreement for want of registration. This enables the lessor to practise a fraud on the lessee. It is to secure the lessee against this fraud that the section has been enacted so that in such a case the writing containing the agreement may be proved in Court notwithstanding non-registration under this section, which always requires an agreement to be in writing wherever the doctrine of part performance is sought to be invoked. To enable the Court to admit unregistered documents of which registration is compulsory, a proviso has been added to section 49 of the Indian Registration Act, XVI of 1908, providing that an unregistered document may be received as evidence of part performance of the contract for the purposes of section 53A. Section 53A is, however, defective inasmuch as no provision is made against the rules laid down in section 23 of the Registration Act requiring documents to be registered within four months and under certain circumstances mentioned in section 25 within 8 months of execution.

The period within which equitable relief can be given to parties to a transaction when there has been no registered instrument.—The Indian decisions indicate conflicting views upon this question. One view is that such relief can be given only within the period during which a suit for specific performance would lie, the other view being that such relief can be given even after the expiration of the period during which the suit for specific performance would lie. The first view did not seem to go far enough to afford the relief which the equities arising in cases of part performance required, because even after the expiration of such period the parties stood in the same relation to each other as they did before the period of limitation expired. As a matter of fact, in dealing with cases of part performance a longer possession gave a higher equity. Hence no period is fixed by the section within which the contract may be enforced. It has been noted that the Courts in India applied the equity in Walsh v. Lonsdale (t) to cases where specific performance had not been barred and that relief was refused where the defendant's claim for specific performance had been barred. In Ariff v. Jadu Nath (u) the Privy Council adopted the former view, stating that the doctrine enunciated in the cases of which Walsh v. Lonsdale was the type, had no application when the defendant's right to enforce a verbal contract had been barred long before the commencement of the suit, so that he was not in a position to obtain specific performance of the agreement from the same Court and at the same time as the relief claimed in the action. The section does not limit the time within which defendant must perfect his title.

Defect in written agreement.—Where there is a whole agreement by parol and part of it is executed, the equitable doctrine of part performance will apply but when there is an executed writing any defect in the agreement cannot be supplied as being intended to be part of that agreement but not inserted in it, for that would be to evade the Statute of Frauds (v).

(t) (1882) 21 Ch. D. 9.

Section 27A of the Specific Relief Act, 1877.—Prior to the introduction of this section an agreement for a lease creating a present demise could not be specifically enforced if unregistered, as the agreement creating a present demise was compulsorily registrable, so that the equity in Walsh v. Lonsdale (w) could not apply to such an instrument. Now that section 53A recognizes such a contract, it has become necessary to introduce this section in the Specific Relief Act to enable the lessor to claim specific performance if he has delivered possession of the property to the lessee in part performance of the contract to lease in writing. On the other hand, the lessee also can claim specific performance of an unregistered agreement to lease creating a present demise, if he has in part performance of the contract to lease in writing, taken possession of the property or, being already in possession, continues in possession in part performance of the contract and has done some act in furtherance of the contract. It must be noted that sub-section (a) of section 27A of the Specific Relief Act enables a plaintiff, that is, a transferor, to seek relief on the ground of part performance which he is not permitted under section 53A to do. But, as already noted, this is recognized by the English Courts even where the contract was verbal and no possession had been delivered to the defendant, but the acts done by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant were acts of part performance (x). The applicability of the section to leases has been recognized (y).

Damages.—The jurisdiction to give damages in substitution for, or in addition to, specific performance, has not been extended to cases where specific performance could not possibly have been directed; and accordingly where a contract from lapse of time, becomes at the hearing incapable of specific performance, the equitable doctrine of part performance does not enable a plaintiff to obtain relief in damages (z).

Knowledge and objection.—According to the section, it is not necessary that the act of part performance should be done with the knowledge of the owner and without objection by him, as was the case in Ramsden v. Dyson (a), where Lord Kingsdown said, "If a man under a verbal agreement with a landlord for a certain interest in land, or, what amounts to the same thing, under an expectation, created or encouraged by the landlord, that he shall have certain interest, takes possession of such land, with the consent of the landlord and upon the faith of such promise or expectation, with the knowledge of the landlord, and without objection by him, lays money upon the land, a Court of Equity will compel the landlord to give effect to such promise or expectation."

CHAPTER III.

OF SALES OF IMMOVEABLE PROPERTY.

S. 54 54. "Sale" is a transfer of ownership in exchange
"Sale defined." for a price paid or promised or part-paid and part-promised.

Such transfer, in the case of tangible immoveable Sale how made. property of the value of one hundred rupees and upwards, or in the case of a reversion or other intangible thing, can be made only by a registered instrument.

In the case of tangible immoveable property, of a value less than one hundred rupees, such transfer may be made either by a registered instrument or by delivery of the property.

Delivery of tangible immoveable property takes place when the seller places the buyer, or such person as he directs, in possession of the property.

A contract for the sale of immoveable property is a Contract for sale. contract that a sale of such property shall take place on terms settled between the parties.

It does not, of itself, create any interest in or charge on such property.

Generally.—Provisions of section 54 are imperative. The express words of an Indian statute are not to be overridden by reference to equitable principles which may have been adopted in the English Courts (b).

Section 54 does not exhaust the relations which flow from a contract for sale of immoveable property according to Indian Statute Law. This section cannot be read by itself. Sections 40 and 55 of the same Act contain important provisions relating to sale. Section 27 (b) of the Specific Relief Act provides for specific performance against a party to a contract or a person claiming under him by title arising subsequent to contract except a transferee for value without notice who has paid the money in good faith.

Section 12 of the same Act creates a presumption that in case of breach of contract to transfer immoveable property compensation in money is not an adequate relief. Again, section 91 of the Trust Act provides that if a person acquires property with notice that another person has entered into an existing contract affecting that property of which specific performance can be enforced, the former must hold the property for the benefit of the latter to the extent necessary to give effect to the contract and section 95 provides that a person holding property in accordance with that section must perform the same duties and is subject to the same liabilities and disabilities as if he were a trustee of the property for the benefit of a person who holds it. Section 3 of the Specific Relief Act defines "obligation" as including every duty enforceable by law. Illustration (g) to that section enunciates the same rule as section 91 of the Trust Act. Again, section 40 of the Transfer of Property Act lays down that where a third person is entitled to the benefit of an obligation arising out of contract and annexed to the ownership of immoveable property but not amounting to an interest therein, such obligation can be enforced against a transferee with notice thereof. Illustration to it is substantially the same as illustration (g) to section 3 of the Specific Relief Act. Further, section 25 of the Specific Relief Act is a bar to the relief of specific performance by a vendor having no title or having a title not free from reasonable doubt while section 18 gives certain rights to a purchaser against a vendor with an imperfect title. Again, sections 14, 15, 16 and 17 enumerate cases where part performance can be granted. There is a distinction between a contract and a conveyance of immoveable property. The former is regulated by the provisions of the Contract Act, IX of 1872, while the latter by the Transfer of Property Act. Once a document transferring an immoveable property has been registered the transaction passes out of the domain of contract to one of conveyance (c). A contract of sale of immoveable property does not create an equitable interest (d) or charge upon the land (e). There is no settled rule of practice in India. It is prepared by one or other of the parties to the transaction. It should be prepared by the vendor as he is familiar with his own title. The rules of the English Courts of Equity have no application to the sale of real estate in Lower Burma (f) and the English rule of law that on a contract for sale the purchaser becomes equitable owner has no application to places to which the Transfer of Property Act is extended (g).

Trusts are recognized in India, no account being taken of the distinction between legal and equitable estates (h). Where there has been an oral agreement to sell land followed by payment of price and delivery of possession to the purchaser, a right of pre-emption arises according to Mahomedan Law even though there is no registered sale deed executed as required by section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act (i). The essentials of a valid sale are a transfer of ownership and a price paid or promised in exchange (j). There can be no sale unless there are mutual agreements in its inception. A sale is often spoken of as a contract of sale with reference to the mutuality of obligations. It must invariably be preceded by a contract, oral or in writing, for sale of the property. The transfer must amount to a total alienation of proprietorship. Agreement for sale does not require registration. Neither an exchange (k) nor compromise (l) nor grant of easements (m) is a sale. A transfer of property by husband to wife in lieu of dower debt is a sale in all its legal incidents (n). Delivery of documents of title does not constitute a sale (o). Under section 11 of the Agra Pre-emption Act a right of pre-emption accrues on the sale of a proprietary interest in land. Section 4, sub-section (10) lays down that a sale means a sale as defined in the Transfer of Property Act of 1882. A transfer of property in exchange for a price but effected by a compromise decree and not by a registered instrument of sale as required by section 54 cannot be treated as a sale as defined in that Act and is therefore not pre-emptible (p). A conveyance by the Official Receiver in insolvency is not exempt from the operation of section 54 (q). This chapter is not affected by any rules of Mahomedan Law (r). A mortgage debt can be validly transferred only in accordance with the provisions of section 54. It should not be treated as validly transferred if the conditions imposed by Statute Law as requisites for the valid transfer of the security have not been complied with (s).

Property.—The term “property” as used in Chapter IV of Act IV of 1882 means an actual physical object and does not include mere rights relating to physical objects. It was so held by four out of five Judges constituting a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court, while the fifth (Mahomood, J.) held: The term “property” throughout the chapter is used in its most generic sense and will include the right known as an “equity of redemption” (t).

Act III of 1885.—This was an Amending Act. The effect is to make section 54, paragraph 3, absolute in so far as it prescribes that a transfer of ownership by sale of tangible immoveable properties of a value less than Rs. 100 can be made only by a registered instrument or by delivery of the property, and that if made otherwise, as by an unregistered instrument unaccompanied by possession, the transfer of sale is inoperative and confers no title on the purchaser (u).

Price.—This is the consideration in the contract for sale. It means money (v) and includes money already due or payable in future (w). If the price be not fixed the transaction is not a sale. Sale is defined in section 54 as a transfer of ownership in exchange for a price paid or promised or part-paid and part-promised. Price means not only money in current coin but includes money due on a prior debt and the words “price paid” will cover cases where the vendor’s claim for the receipt of the price is satisfied by giving him what he accepts as tantamount to such payment (x). The word “price” as used in the sections of the Transfer of Property Act relating to sales is in the sense of money. Service rendered in the past or to be rendered in future cannot be regarded as price as held by a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court in Samaratmal v. Govind (y). A sale of land partly for money and partly for forbearance on the part of the purchaser to take proceedings unfavourable to the vendor will make the transaction neither a sale nor an exchange (z). The transaction cannot be treated as a gift for want of consideration. A transfer in lieu of dower debt has been held to be a sale (a). But it was a decision under the Agra Pre-emption Act wherein is incorporated section 54 of the present Act without the other provisions of the Act. In an earlier case the same Court took the same view where the question was not of pre-emption (b). Where the consideration is partial release from dower (c) or the transaction is styled a gift in lieu of dower, it is not a sale (d); the latter is a hiba-bil-ewaz. All cases of hiba-bil-ewaz cannot be held to be a sale within the meaning of this section (e). Mere inadequacy of consideration does not vitiate sale (f), nor does it render the sale fictitious though it may be evidence that the deed was not intended to operate (g). Price is of the essence of the contract (h). It need not be ascertained at once. The agreement may stipulate the manner of ascertaining it (i). It must be paid or promised or part-paid and part-promised. If it be neither paid nor promised there is no sale (j).

If conditions be attached to the payment of the purchase-money in the deed they do not prevent the transaction amounting to a sale within the definition (k). If it is to be fixed by arbitrators and they do not fix it there is no contract (l). The time of valuation is of the essence of the contract (m). And where parties had agreed that the valuation should be made "in the usual way" by two valuers, one to be named by each party, and after the appointment, one of the parties refused to allow his valuer to proceed with the valuation, it was held that there was no contract between the parties which could be specifically enforced (n). Nor would the Court grant specific performance where there is an under-valuation by the valuers (o). Discharge of future maintenance is not a price (p). A sale is complete notwithstanding non-payment of the purchase-money and the purchaser can maintain a suit for possession subject to such equities, restrictions or conditions as the nature of the case may require (q). As regards the purchaser's right to possession against an unpaid vendor, the view of the Madras High Court is that as under the Transfer of Property Act the purchaser after completion is entitled to possession and the vendor to a statutory charge on the property for unpaid purchase-money under section 55, it is not competent in a purchaser's suit for possession for the Court to pass a decree for possession conditional on the purchaser paying the balance of the purchase-money, and the vendor should file a separate suit for the purchase-money (r). But the view of the Allahabad (s) and Bombay High Courts (t) are that the Court can in one suit dispose of both questions and direct that on the purchaser paying the purchase-money within a stated time the vendor do deliver the property to him and in default the purchaser do forfeit his right to recover the property and that his suit do stand dismissed with costs. Failure to pay the consideration for a conveyance does not defeat the conveyance except where there is an agreement that it should take effect only if the consideration is first paid (u). Although non-payment of consideration is not a ground for rescission, if the sale is brought about by undue influence or the helpless condition of the vendor who was illiterate and without independent advice, it would be void not only under section 54 read with section 4 of the Transfer of Property Act but also under section 25 of the Contract Act (v). In a suit for land it appeared that in 1887 A had executed in favour of B a registered conveyance of the land in question without consideration. The vendor had retained possession and sold the land to C who discharged a mortgage which B was to pay. In the interval between the two transactions the plaintiff purchased the land from B and he now alleged that the persons in possession had executed a rent agreement in fact found to be a forgery. Held that the plaintiff's claim founded on the transaction of 1887 did not prevail against C (w).

Burden of proof when price not paid.—Ordinarily, a party to a deed executed and registered, who alleges non-payment, must prove his allegations but when possession of the vendor has been continuous and the claimant and his predecessor have silently submitted to such withholding of possession, it is for the latter to prove payment (x). It is settled law that where there has been a false acknowledgment by recital in a deed of sale of payment by the purchaser of the consideration and of its receipt by the vendor it is open to the latter, notwithstanding section 92 of the Evidence Act, to prove that no consideration was actually paid (y). Vendee directed to pay certain encumbrances, payment not a condition precedent to vesting of title (z). The Court has to see what was the intention of the parties if no consideration passed. Where it appeared that it was the intention of the owner, whether consideration passed or not, to transfer the property to the defendant, who was his concubine, and the plaintiff claimed the property by right of inheritance, the defendant was not bound to prove payment of consideration (a). If part of the consideration has not been paid the sale will not thereby be rendered void wholly or partially (b). A third party or stranger cannot attack the validity of a sale deed on the ground that consideration was not paid to the vendor (c). Where part of the consideration is good the mere fact that a portion has not been paid does not justify the inference that the parties did not intend the sale deed to be enforceable (d). Defendant sold immoveable property to plaintiff by a registered conveyance. Plaintiff did not pay the price and sued for possession from the vendor. The lower Court made a conditional decree on payment of the price. Plaintiff appealed. Held, he was entitled to an unconditional decree for possession (e). A sale is not rendered void, wholly or partially, because a part of the consideration is not paid. All that the vendor is legally entitled in that case, is to a lien on the property sold, to the extent of the amount not paid (f).

Consideration, inadequacy of.—By itself inadequacy of price is no ground for setting aside a contract (g) unless combined with misrepresentation and surprise upon parties in distress and not properly protected (h); or made with a poor and ignorant vendor at a considerable undervalue (i); or by imposition on a vendor who had confidence in the purchaser (j); or made in ignorance of rights, under pecuniary pressure and without proper legal advice (k). In India provision is made by section 28 of the Specific Relief Act (I of 1877) which enacts that specific performance of a contract cannot be granted if the consideration is so grossly inadequate with reference to the state of things existing at the date of the contract, as to be either by itself or coupled with other circumstances evidence of fraud or of undue advantage taken by the plaintiff (l). Relief was refused where there was no evidence of fraud, though the price for which the property was sold was grossly inadequate. The Court observed that the English rule until the passing of statute 31 Vic., c. 4, that specific performance of an agreement to sell a reversionary interest should not be decreed when the purchase-money was less than the market value of the reversion, has no application to India (m). In India provision is made to meet such cases by the Specific Relief Act (n).

Tangible property.—An undivided share in immoveable property is tangible immoveable property within the meaning of section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act (o). It is characterized by possession. Where tangible immoveable property is of the value of Rs. 100 or upwards the sale must be effected by a registered instrument. Mere possession unaccompanied by a registered instrument will confer no title even though purchase-money has been paid in part (p). A mango tree or a messuage is a tangible thing. In contrast with tangible immoveable property, is an intangible thing or an interest in immoveable property, which cannot be the subject of possession, such as a reversion or remainder. An incorporeal hereditament is compulsorily registrable. Hence the right to cut and appropriate plants, standing or which may grow on certain land, must be registered. The interest of a simple mortgagee is an intangible thing (q). Equity of redemption in a usufructuary mortgage is an intangible thing (r). An earlier decision of the Allahabad High Court took the same view (s) but this was subsequently altered by a Full Bench of the same Court (t). Where the interest conveyed is a reversion in the property, as when the property is in possession of tenants, the deed should be registered even though the value be less than Rs. 100 (u).

Mortgage debt.—A debt secured by mortgage of immoveable property can only be transferred in accordance with section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act (v). For the purpose of section 54, a mortgage debt is immoveable property (w). An unregistered agreement, for consideration, to transfer a debt with the benefit of the immoveable security for it, is ineffectual to transfer the security. Though it operates as between the transferor and transferee to transfer the debt, a suit to recover the debt must be in the name of the transferor, and consequently he is not prevented by the transfer from suing to enforce the security (x).

Reversion.—Reversion is the undisposed of interest in land which reverts after the exhaustion of the particular estate which may have been created. Like remainders and executory interests, reversions are mixed incorporeal hereditaments. An assignment of the reversion, whatever may be its value, requires registration. As between landlord and tenant reversion is the only interest in the property which remains with the landlord, after he has leased his immoveable property to his tenant and made over possession to him. A house which was in possession of defendants as tenants, was sold to them by the owner in 1909 for Rs. 50 by an unregistered deed of sale and again sold in 1910 by the owner to the plaintiff by a registered sale deed; the plaintiff's claim was allowed (y). A contrary view expressed by the Calcutta High Court (z) is somewhat difficult to follow.

Registration.—As regards registration, the section draws a sharp distinction between tangible property and a reversion or other intangible thing. In the latter case the transaction must be evidenced by a registered instrument irrespective of the price; whilst in the case of tangible immoveable property a distinction is made, whereby property of the value of Rs. 100 and upwards needs registration. Either a registered instrument or delivery of possession is necessary for a valid transfer and sale of property under the value of Rs. 100 (a). If delivery is not possible, it must be by a registered deed (b). As to the effect of non-registration of documents, reference may be made to section 49 of the Indian Registration Act, 1908. Mere registration does not convey title to a purchaser (c). If the intention of the parties was that no title should pass to the purchaser until payment of purchase-money in full (d), the condition must be strictly fulfilled (e). If a purchaser is directed to pay certain debts binding on the property, such payment is not a condition precedent to vesting of title (f). Registration is not a formality which creates any right. It is prima facie proof of intention to transfer the title. It is no proof of operative transfer (g).

The registration of a sale deed effects a transfer of the property to the purchaser (h), but no property passes to the purchaser who has paid the purchase-money and obtained possession, if the deed be not registered, when the value of the immoveable property is above Rs. 100 (i). A vendor who has not executed a registered deed of transfer is not estopped from pleading that the purchaser had no title by his admission of an agreement for sale in a suit for possession (j). The effect of section 4 of the Transfer of Property Act is not to make section 49 of the Registration Act applicable to documents which are compulsorily registrable by the provisions of section 54, paragraph 2 of the Transfer of Property Act and not by the provisions of section 17 of the Registration Act itself (k). In dealing with the case of a fictitious inclusion of property for the purpose of registration, the Judicial Committee observed that they were not prepared to accept the suggestion that for the purpose of section 54 some sort of constructive possession resulting from the delivery of the instrument and transfer might be sufficient and for that purpose there must have been a real delivery of the property (l). A fictitious entry in a schedule intentionally made by the parties for the purpose of obtaining registration in the district where no part of the property actually charged and intended to be charged in fact existed, is a fraud on registration law and no registration obtained by means thereof is valid. And the deed not having been registered in accordance with the Registration Act, the mortgagee has no title to maintain the suit. The Judicial Committee further held that the principle of concurrent findings of fact does not apply to the case of no evidence, for a decision, that there is no evidence to support a finding is a question of law (m). The above principle is equally applicable to sales. On a transfer of moveable and immoveable property for a single consideration, where the registration of the latter is compulsory, non-registration would be ineffectual to affect a transfer of the moveables (n).

Transfer of ownership of tangible immoveable property of value less than Rs. 100.—Where the value of tangible immoveable property is Rs. 100 or more, there is only one way in which transfer of ownership can be effected and that is by a registered instrument. But where tangible immoveable property is of a value less than Rs. 100, two alternative ways are provided by paragraph 3 to section 54, one by registered instrument as in the case of property of the value of Rs. 100 or more, and the other by delivery of the property. What is delivery is explained hereafter. In the latter case a conflict arises where the parties choose to carry out their transaction not only by delivery but by delivery accompanied by written instrument. One view is that the written instrument should be registered, while the other view is that registration is unnecessary as the transfer of ownership is effected by delivery and the written instrument is merely evidence of the transaction. The latter view seems in consonance with the provisions of the section, for it cannot be that where delivery is enough, the existence of a written instrument should nullify the transfer of ownership. Hence transfers of such properties may be made (1) by a registered instrument or (2) by delivery of the property (o). There is nothing in section 54 which would render a sale effected by

S. 54 the second alternative, void by reason of the execution of a non-registered deed of sale (p). Even though the unregistered instrument did not confer on the purchaser any title, he could fall back on his title by delivery (q). A transfer effected by an unregistered deed of sale followed by delivery, has priority over one effected by a subsequent registered deed (r). An unregistered deed with delivery of possession is not destructive of the transaction. It has been held by the Calcutta High Court that the document does not confer title and is merely evidentiary, but having regard to section 91 of the Evidence Act it may be the only admissible evidence of the nature and terms of the transaction, though that section would not include proof of the fact of delivery of possession (s). A similar view was adopted by the Allahabad (t), Lahore (u) and Patna (v) High Courts and also by Macleod, J., in a Bombay case (w). The opposite view was taken by the Madras High Court (x) and the Rangoon Chief Court (y). The authorities were reviewed at length by the former Court in Kuppuswami v. Chinna-swami (z) in which the Court came to the conclusion that a sale of property less than Rs. 100 in value, if in writing, has to be registered, observing that the expression "sale by delivery of property" should be construed as comprising a case where the parties agree that the transaction should be effected by delivery, and would not include a case where they agreed to reduce to the form of a document the terms of the sale. The moment the parties reduce the terms to writing, the transaction cannot correctly be described as a sale by delivery of the property. The conflict has now been set at rest by the proviso to section 49 of the Indian Registration Act (a). It should be observed that this method of transfer of ownership by delivery does not apply in the cases of reversion or other intangible thing obviously as they are not capable of delivery. In the Punjab, whether the property be tangible, immoveable property or an intangible thing or reversion, even an oral sale is valid as the Act is not applicable there (b).

Sale with condition for reconveyance.—A property is conveyed with a condition that on the sale consideration being repaid it shall be reconveyed. Payment of money into Court is as valid as payment or tender to the person entitled to receive it or to his account in a bank (c).

Rule of perpetuities.—A contract to convey or reconvey immoveable properties, whenever demanded for a certain amount, is only a personal contract and does not create any interest in immoveable property and is therefore enforceable and not void as contravening the rule against perpetuities (d). In such a case, the document giving to the vendor rights, contrary to those parted with, should be registered, if the sale deed is also registered as affecting property of a value not less than Rs. 100 (e). But a covenant, contained in a deed of sale of immoveable property, which purported to impose upon the purchaser and his representatives indefinitely, an obligation in the event of their wishing to sell property purchased, to communicate their intention to the vendor or his representatives and to confer on the latter a right to pre-empt is void as offending the law against perpetuities (f).

Avoidance of sale.—Where a transfer of property of a value over Rs. 100 has been effected by a registered instrument it can only be avoided by a registered instrument unless equitable relief for its cancellation is sought (g) and so also a document which gives to the vendor rights, contrary to those parted with in the sale deed (h). But section 54 does not permit an agreement to reconvey to be pleaded in bar to the purchaser's right to recover possession (i).

Offer to give first opportunity to purchaser.—This is not a contract to sell property and unless perfected by acceptance, is not binding. By itself there is nothing in this offer to compel the offeree to purchase (j).

Delivery.—According to paragraph 4 of the section, delivery takes place when the seller places the buyer or such person as the buyer directs, in possession of the property. Delivery may be actual or constructive, or both. If the property is vacant, the buyer can be placed in actual physical possession, but if it is occupied by tenants, possession would have to be constructive, as by asking the tenants to attorn to the buyer. Or the buyer may be already in possession in his capacity as a tenant or mortgagee. Delivery is deemed to be made, provided the vendor by appropriate acts or declarations, converts the position of the purchaser as tenant or mortgagee into purchaser (k), for possession under an encumbrance together with an agreement to sell, is equivalent to delivery of possession under section 48 of the Indian Registration Act (l). In actual practice possession is obtained by entering on a part in the name of the whole (m). A Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court in Sohan Lal v. Mohan Lal (n), following the decision of the Calcutta High Court in Sibendrapada Bannerji v. The Secretary of State for India in Council (o), has taken the view that if property is already in possession of the transferee, there could be no delivery without first asking the transferee to vacate the property and that delivery under this section meant actual delivery and not constructive delivery. The Full Bench was dealing with the transfer of the equity of redemption of the mortgagor. The Court held that the document did not effect a change in title, there being no delivery of the property. No title passed even if such interest be regarded as tangible, immoveable property and that if such interest were intangible property, it was compulsorily registrable under section 54 and that there was no distinction between a simple mortgage and a usufructuary mortgage. This view, however, does not seem, with due respect, to be a correct exposition of the law (p). Further, such a view would make property of a value less than Rs. 100 compulsorily registrable. Yet another Court has held that for the purposes of section 54, there must be a real delivery of property. Where deed is not registered, any sort of constructive possession is not sufficient (q). There does not seem to be any reason why a request by the vendor to the purchaser to remain in possession in the capacity of a purchaser, should not be sufficient to pass title without recourse to the expedient of the purchaser quitting the property one moment and entering upon it at another. It is submitted that an arrangement by which the legal nature and character of the previous possession is put an end to and subsequent possession treated as one by the purchaser with absolute title is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act. So far as delivery of possession is concerned there seems to be no difference between the provisions of section 48 of the Registration Act and those of section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act. A correct view has been taken by the Court of Madras (r), the earlier cases of the Courts at Nagpur (s) and later by the Courts at Calcutta (t).

Effect of contract for sale.—Under English Law, on a contract for sale of land the vendor parts with his rights and dominion over it. It is in equity no longer his. He is considered constructively a trustee for the purchaser and the latter as a trustee of the purchase-money for the vendor (u). This rule is followed in the Punjab (v) where the Act is not in force. The land contracted to be sold is vendible and chargeable as his and capable of being encumbered and devised as his (w). The vendor, however, during his possession becomes a trustee without any qualification as soon as the title is accepted and the purchase-money paid (x). Under the Transfer of Property Act a contract for sale creates by itself no interest in such property (y). No change of ownership takes place, and the purchaser acquires no interest (z) in the property or any charge on the property (a) unless deposit is made. Even part-payment of the price or earnest makes no difference (b). The utmost right which is conferred upon the purchaser, is to enable him to call upon the vendor for possession and conveyance on payment of the purchase-money (c). The purchaser, however, can transfer or assign his benefits under the contract to a third party, so as to confer upon him the rights possessed by him and impose upon him the same obligation to which he, the purchaser, is subject. The purchaser's remedy is personal against the vendor or his assignee with notice of the agreement, either to enforce the contract by a suit for specific performance (d) or to claim damages. Where the vendor has sold the property to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the agreement, the purchaser's remedy is in damages. A suit for specific performance is not the purchaser's only remedy. If there are no other facts operating to his prejudice, he may successfully plead his contract for sale and the possession acquired under it (e). The agreement for sale transfers no estate, so that even the right of a co-sharer cannot be transferred or assigned by such an agreement (f). It need not be registered even though the earnest or the whole of the purchase-money be paid, for it does not operate to create or declare an interest but comes under clause (h) of the Registration Act, XVI of 1908, as a document merely creating a right to obtain another document which would, when executed, create or declare an interest in immoveable property (g). The purchaser is entitled to the benefit of an obligation arising out of contract and annexed to the ownership of immoveable property and such obligation may be enforced against a transferee with notice thereof or a gratuitous transferee (h). A registered contract for sale operates as a sale, on fulfilment of conditions mentioned therein (i). On an agreement to sell property devised, the devisee can be called upon to pass a conveyance and receive the purchase-money (j). Having no direct right to the land, the purchaser cannot apply to set aside a sale under O. 21, r. 89 of the Code of Civil Procedure (k). Until sale, it is attachable at the instance of the vendor's creditors (l) though the Court purchaser could only take the judgment debtor's right, title and interest existing at the date of sale, namely, subject to the equity in favour of the purchaser to compel specific performance (m). A distinction was, however, made when the vendor had delivered possession and received the purchase-money, though no registered deed was executed (n); also when property was in possession of a Mahomedan widow under a decree for dower (o) and an award transferred the husband's property to the wife without a conveyance (p). A distinction has been observed between a contract of sale and a contract to sell, the former being an executed contract and the latter only executory. Sale creates a jus in rem, as it passes ownership immediately it is executed, and a contract to sell is a jus ad rem, for it only creates an obligation attached to the ownership of property and does not amount to an interest therein (q).

Contract for sale viewed in the light of section 13 of the Specific Relief Act, I of 1877.—Section 54 provides that a contract for sale by itself does not create any interest in immoveable property. By section 13 of the Specific Relief Act, I of 1877, it is provided that a contract is not wholly impossible of performance if a portion of its subject-matter existing at its date has ceased to exist at the time of the performance. Illustration (a) to the section renders it clear, that when a contract for sale is made, the purchaser becomes, as in English Law, the owner of the property. Inconsistent as the illustration to section 13 of the Specific Relief Act is with the provisions of this Act, it can have no application in cases to which the Transfer of Property Act applies. By virtue of section 55 (5) (c) of the latter Act, the loss

Agreement for sale contemplating execution of a formal agreement.—It appears to be well settled that if the document by which the parties have made the contract, contemplates execution of a further contract between the parties, it is a question of construction whether the execution of the further contract is a condition or term of the bargain (r) or whether it is a mere expression of the desire of the parties as to the manner in which the transaction will go through (s). In the former case there is no enforceable contract; in the latter it is a binding contract (t). An agreement, which provides that the vendor is willing to sell a leasehold house subject to the preparation by his solicitor and completion of the formal contract, is not final (u). Holding in Rossdale v. Denny (v) that an offer "subject to formal contract to embody such reasonable provisions as solicitor may approve, was conditional and not a binding contract," Russell, J., in summing up the authorities stated as follows:—"If upon the true construction of the documents, the reference to a formal contract amounts to an expression of a desire on the part of one or other of the parties, or both, that their already complete contract should be reduced into a mere formal shape, then the fact that no such contract has been executed is no defence to the action, but the original and complete contract survives and may be enforced. If, on the other hand, the true construction of the documents is this, that either the offer or the acceptance was conditional only, then the non-execution of a formal contract affords a defence to the action, upon the ground that the parties really did not intend to be bound until a formal document had in fact been executed." Documents may upon their true construction, amount to a binding contract enforceable by specific performance, although they provide for the preparation of a contract by a vakil, and that provision with other terms of the agreement is described as a condition. The mere fact that persons wish to have a formal agreement drawn up, does not establish the proposition that they cannot be bound by a previous agreement. The reservation in respect of a formal document to be prepared by a vakil, only means that it should be put in proper shape and in legal phraseology with any subsidiary term that the vakil may think necessary for insertion in a formal document (w). A contract of sale, according to section 37 of the Indian Contract Act, IX of 1872, is enforceable against the representatives of the contracting parties (x).

nor an interest in immoveable property, but it gives the obligee the benefit of an obligation to execute a conveyance under section 40, clause 2, which may be enforced against a transferee with notice of that obligation. Such transferee is in the position of a trustee for the obligee, and cannot profit by his conveyance, except to stand in the shoes of the vendor and receive the balance of the purchase-money due, on payment of which, he has to convey to the defendant and is subject to the liability of having a decree against him passed for specific performance of the contract. The authorities establish that a person who has notice of an agreement for sale of immoveable property cannot, with notice of such contract, by entering into a contract for sale with the vendor, defeat the rights of the prior purchaser even by obtaining a registered conveyance and possession of the property (y). The principle is based on the doctrine of notice. Section 40 of the Transfer of Property Act enacts that where a third person is entitled to the benefit of an obligation arising out of contract and annexed to the ownership of immoveable property not amounting to an interest therein or an easement therein, such obligation may be enforced against a transferee with notice thereof, but not against a transferee for consideration and without notice of the obligation. Analogous provisions are made in section 27 (b) of the Specific Relief Act (z) and section 91 of the Indian Trust Act (a). The latter statute regards such obligation as in the nature of a trust, while the former empowers a Court to decree specific performance of the contract against any person claiming under a party thereto, by a title arising subsequently to the contract, except a transferee (1) for value, (2) in good faith, and (3) without notice of the original contract (b), the burden of proving which, lies on such transferee. For when a party claims exemption from a general provision of law, the onus lies on him to prove that he comes within the exception (c). Very little evidence and in certain circumstances, a mere denial on oath regarding want of knowledge of the plaintiff's contract, would discharge this onus and shift it on the plaintiff (d). In this sub-section the word "transferee" is not used in the wide sense as meaning a person to whom a conveyance has been made. Registration of a conveyance is contemplated by the Legislature (e) and the words "any other person claiming under him by a title arising subsequently to the contract" includes the heirs and legal representatives of a deceased party to a contract (f). In order to establish that he is a bona fide purchaser for value, a subsequent purchaser must prove, when the plaintiff claiming under a prior contract is in possession, that he inquired of the nature of his possession from the plaintiff (g). When a decree is passed in a civil suit against a defendant and his property sold in execution, the purchaser acquires a good title, though the decree be afterwards set aside. But in case of a sale by a Revenue Court for arrears of assessment, if it should turn out that the land was not liable to assessment, the sale would be set aside. In the latter case the plea of purchase without notice will not be available (h). Nor can the subsequent registered purchaser plead as a bar to a suit against him, a prior decree obtained in a suit for specific performance against his vendor by the original purchaser (i). The proper form of decree in such cases is to direct the subsequent purchaser to execute a conveyance to the plaintiff (j). Registration of the original contract, according to the Bombay (k) and Allahabad (l) High Courts is notice, whilst the Calcutta (m), Madras (n), Central Provinces (o) and Burma Courts have held that registration of itself is not notice. The Judicial Committee adopted the view of the Courts of Calcutta and Madras that it depended upon the circumstances of each case whether registration was or was not notice in itself (p). The subject of notice is further elucidated by two illustrations to section 27 of the Specific Relief Act. The one runs thus:—"A contracts to sell land to B for Rs. 5,000. A afterwards conveys the land for Rs. 6,000 to C who has notice of the original contract." The other is as follows: B takes possession of the land. Afterwards A sells it to C for Rs. 6,000. C makes no inquiry of B relating to his interest in the land, B's possession is sufficient to affect C with notice of his interest, and he may enforce specific performance of the contract against C." This authoritatively declares the law in accordance with the leading case of Daniels v. Davison (q). The notice referred to in the above referred cases, does not in each instance appear to have consisted solely in registration but in possession as well, as to which, the general consensus of opinion of all the High Courts, following English decisions, appears to be that possession, if not notice, is at least very cogent evidence of notice which a purchaser cannot with safety disregard, as the terms on which that person is in possession, are circumstances giving him an equity repelling the claim of a subsequent purchaser, who made no inquiry as to the nature of his possession and that section 50 of the Registration Act (XVI of 1908) does not do away with the effect of notice in favour of the registration to which cæteris paribus it gives preference (r). It appears to be the result of the Bombay decisions that no purchaser can protect himself merely by registering his document of title against the title of a person in possession of the subject-matter and if he ignores that possession and fails to make inquiry into its nature and origin he will be affected by all the equities which the person in possession is proved to have (s). When a person has possession of another man's property, the legal character in which he holds it, is to be determined by his animus (t). A purchaser put into possession under an oral sale is entitled to call for a registered deed and a subsequent registered sale deed confers no title on the subsequent purchaser having notice of Whether an agreement for sale followed by possession but not by registered conveyance is a valid defence to a suit for ejectment.—The question was answered in the affirmative by a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court, where the vendor sought to recover possession and there were no facts operating to his prejudice. It was a valid defence to the suit, that the vendor had agreed to sell the property to the purchaser, the agreement being at the date of the suit still capable of specific performance, although there was no registered conveyance to the defendant, who had taken possession and was willing to perform his part of the contract (v). The same question arose before a Full Bench of the Madras High Court which held that part-performance by way of delivery of possession and an enforceable right on the purchaser's part to specific performance, are each good defences to an action for ejectment based on the want of a conveyance (w). The same Bench was satisfied that the earlier cases (x) of that Court had been wrongly decided. The Madras Full Bench decision proceeded on the principle of part-performance, whilst the Bombay Full Bench decision was based on the fiduciary aspect of the vendor's position and the impropriety of permitting him to succeed against his purchaser in a suit for possession. The same argument was applied where the purchaser in possession had allowed time for filing a suit for specific performance to expire (y). Earlier cases, however, had taken the view that on account of non-payment of the whole or part of the price, it was not open to a vendor having given possession, to rescind the contract and recover possession, though he may have a lien upon the property for the unpaid balance of the purchase-money (z). The Privy Council answered the question in the negative in a case (a) where the point arose, before the partial importation into India of the doctrine of part-performance as enunciated in section 53A.

which the buyer could not with ordinary care discover ;

- (b) to produce to the buyer on his request for examination all documents of title relating to the property which are in the seller's possession or power ;
- (c) to answer to the best of his information all relevant questions put to him by the buyer in respect to the property or the title thereto ;
- (d) on payment or tender of the amount due in respect of the price, to execute a proper conveyance of the property when the buyer tenders it to him for execution at a proper time and place ;
- (e) between the date of the contract for sale and the delivery of the property, to take as much care of the property and all documents of title relating thereto which are in his possession as an owner of ordinary prudence would take of such property and documents ;
- (f) to give, on being so required, the buyer, or such person as he directs, such possession of the property as its nature admits ;
- (g) to pay all public charges and rent accrued due in respect of the property up to the date of the sale, the interest on all incumbrances on such property due on such date, and except where the property is sold subject to incumbrances, to discharge all incumbrances on the property then existing.

(2) The seller shall be deemed to contract with the buyer that the interest which the seller professes to transfer to the buyer subsists and that he has power to transfer the same.

Provided that, where the sale is made by a person in a fiduciary character, he shall be deemed to contract with the buyer that the seller has done no act whereby the property is incumbered or whereby he is hindered from transferring it.

The benefit of the contract mentioned in this rule shall be annexed to, and shall go with, the interest of the transferee as such, and may be enforced by every person in whom that interest is for the whole or any part thereof from time to time vested. S. 55

(3) Where the whole of the purchase-money has been paid to the seller, he is also bound to deliver to the buyer all documents of title relating to the property which are in the seller's possession or power;

Provided that, (a) where the seller retains any part of the property comprised in such documents, he is entitled to retain them all, and, (b) where the whole of such property is sold to different buyers, the buyer of the lot of greatest value is entitled to such documents. But in case (a) the seller, and in case (b) the buyer of the lot of greatest value, is bound, upon every reasonable request by the buyer, or by any of the other buyers, as the case may be, and at the cost of the person making the request, to produce the said documents and furnish such true copies thereof or extracts therefrom as he may require; and in the meantime, the seller, or the buyer of the lot of greatest value, as the case may be, shall keep the said documents safe, uncanceled and undefaced, unless prevented from so doing by fire or other inevitable accident.

(4) The seller is entitled—

- (a) to the rents and profits of the property till the ownership thereof passes to the buyer;
- (b) where the ownership of the property has passed to the buyer before payment of the whole of the purchase-money, to a charge upon the property in the hands of the buyer, any transferee without consideration or any transferee with notice of the non-payment, for the amount of the purchase-money, or any part thereof remaining unpaid, and for interest on such amount or part from the date on which possession has been delivered.

(5) The buyer is bound—

- (a) to disclose to the seller any fact as to the nature or extent of the seller's interest in the property of which the buyer is aware but of which he has reason to believe that the seller is not aware, and which materially increases the value of such interest ;

- (b) to pay or tender, at the time and place of completing the sale, the purchase-money to the seller or such person as he directs : provided that, where the property is sold free from incumbrances, the buyer may retain out of the purchase-money, the amount of any incumbrances on the property existing at the date of the sale, and shall pay the amount so retained to the persons entitled thereto ;
 - (c) where the ownership of the property has passed to the buyer, to bear any loss arising from the destruction, injury or decrease in value of the property not caused by the seller ;
 - (d) where the ownership of the property has passed to the buyer, as between himself and the seller, to pay all public charges and rent which may become payable in respect of the property, the principal moneys due on any incumbrances subject to which the property is sold, and the interest thereon afterwards accruing due.
- (6) The buyer is entitled—
- (a) where the ownership of the property has passed to him, to the benefit of any improvement in, or increase in value of, the property, and to the rents and profits thereof ;
 - (b) unless he has improperly declined to accept delivery of the property, to a charge on the property, as against the seller and all persons claiming under him, , to the extent of the seller's interest in the property, for the amount of any purchase-money properly paid by the buyer in anticipation of the delivery and for interest on such amount ; and, when he properly declines to accept the delivery, also for the earnest (if any) and for the costs (if any) awarded to him of a suit to compel specific performance of the contract or to obtain a decree for its rescission.

An omission to make such disclosures as are mentioned in this section, paragraph (1), clause (a), and paragraph (5), clause (a), is fraudulent.

Implied covenants between vendor and purchaser.—The section lays down the mutual rights and obligations of the contracting parties, viz., the vendor and the purchaser respectively of immoveable property, unless the statutory obligation is negatived in the particular circumstances of the case, by reason of the terms of the contract for sale. Both parties are governed by the rules laid down in the section. A vendor who desires to limit the rights of a purchaser must do so by explicit and plain conditions. The rules laid down in the section are what are said to be implied covenants between the parties. An express covenant excludes an implied covenant but an express covenant to the contrary, relied on as a bar to the plaintiff's claim to be indemnified under section 55 of the Transfer of Property Act, must be in plain and unambiguous language (b).

In the absence of a contract to the contrary.—The words "in the absence of a contract to the contrary" which appear in the first part of the section and control all the rules, mean that the general rules, by which the rights and liabilities of the vendors and purchasers are regulated by this section, are not applicable when those rights and liabilities are governed by the express provisions of a contract between the parties (c).

Buyer.—As to the word "purchaser," "though the words 'purchase' and 'purchaser' may technically imply an acquisition of property otherwise than by descent, in relation to a sale of land, they are commonly used as appropriate to the stage prior to actual completion by conveyance or transfer" (d).

Seller.—The word "seller" in section 55, clause (1) as applied to the provisions of sub-clauses (a) to (d) of that section, can mean only a person who has contracted to sell but has not yet sold. In sub-clauses (e) and (g) it seems, however, to mean the person who has not only contracted to sell but has also actually sold. In sub-clause (f), it seems to mean the same thing, where possession ought naturally to follow only on the completion of the sale, that is, in cases where a registered conveyance is necessary to convey title but it might include also a person who has only contracted to sell when the delivery of possession itself has to be made to complete the sale (as in the case of a sale of property worth less than Rs. 100 and not effected by a registered conveyance). In clause (2) the word "seller" seems to mean the same thing as in sub-clauses (e) and (g) of clause (1), that is, a person who has actually parted with his title (e).

English Law.—It has been observed by the Judicial Committee that the rules of English Courts of Equity have no application to the sale of real estate in Lower Burma (f).

Clause (1), Sub-clause (a): Disclosure by Vendor.

Amendment.—Sub-clause (a) of clause (1) was amended by Act 20 of 1929, by the addition of the words "or in the seller's title thereto" in order to give effect to

S. 55 the decision that the expression "material defect" includes a defect in title to an estate (g).

Ordinary care.—The words "ordinary care" in clause (a) of section 55 of the Transfer of Property Act mean that "a purchaser of property is under no legal obligation to investigate his vendor's title. But in dealing with real property, as in other matters of business, regard is had to the usual course of business and a purchaser, who wilfully departs from it in order to avoid acquiring a knowledge of the vendor's title, is not allowed to derive any advantage from his wilful ignorance of defects which would have come to his knowledge, if he had transacted his business in the ordinary way" (h).

Material.—The word is nowhere defined in the Act. In order to entitle the purchaser to relief on the ground of defect in title or property such defect must be substantial and not trifling. The defect which can be cured or remedied or is of such a nature as not to interfere with the enjoyment of the property or retention of it against any adverse claimant, is not a defect which can be said to be material. A defect is material when the Court, on account of its existence, would not enforce specific performance at the instance of the vendor. In the words of Lord Justice Knight Bruce in Leyland v. Illingworth (i), a representation is materially incorrect when "it is importantly otherwise than true," though there may be no imputation of fraudulent or dishonest intention to anyone. Facts which are necessary for a purchaser to know in order to judge of the nature and value of the property are material (j). A defect which may be material to one set of circumstances may not be so to another. For instance, the existence of an underground current of running water could not be material when the property was purchased for residential purposes (k), but would be so when it was purchased for building purposes (l). A defect to be material must be of such a nature that it might reasonably be supposed that if the buyer had been aware of it, he might not have entered into the contract at all, for he would be getting something different from what he contracted to buy (m). In order to be material, the defect must be such as would influence the purchaser in making up his mind to purchase the property or fix the price or agree to other conditions or restrictions in respect thereof. Material defect includes defect in title and when the defect is not apparent in the title-deed and the purchaser was not bound to make inquiries which would have led to the discovery of the defect, the vendor's omission entitles the purchaser to avoid the contract (n).

Disclosure of material defect in the property.—The difficulty here, as in a great majority of the cases which come before the Court, is not a difficulty as to what the law is but as to the application of the law. There is no doubt what the principle is, as to questions of this kind. It is the obvious duty of a vendor to make himself fully acquainted with all the peculiarities and incidents of the property which he is going to sell; and when he describes the property for the information of the purchaser, it is his duty to describe everything which it is material to know, in order to judge of the nature and value of the property. It is not for him just to tell what is not actually untrue, leaving out a great deal that is true; and leaving it to the purchaser to inquire whether there is an error or omission in the description or not (o).

Paragraph 1 (a) of section 55 imposes a statutory obligation on the vendor to disclose to the purchaser material defects (p) not only relating to the state and condition of the property, but also as regards his own title subject to the qualification that the duty to disclose extends only to defects of which the seller is and the buyer is not aware (q) and which the latter on a careful observation could not discover (r). A defect may be either patent or latent. In order to be patent, it must be either visible to the eye or arise by necessary implication through something visible to the eye (s). There is no duty to warn the purchaser of doubtful claims. There is no duty on the part of the seller to disclose defects in title or existence of an encumbrance of which the buyer is aware (t). There is no duty on the seller's part to make disclosures about matters of which the buyer is perfectly well aware or which relate to the tenure of the land. The evidence to prove knowledge on the part of the buyer cannot be said to vary or contradict the terms of the contract (u). Nor is there any duty to disclose matters which relate to the quality of the land. The rule of caveat emptor applies. It is the duty of the purchaser to exercise due care and ascertain for himself what he is purchasing. For instance, there is no duty to disclose that a house is in a ruinous condition (v) or that there is a highway across the land (w). Yet matters which are not visible on careful inspection and which are likely to influence the purchaser's judgment must be disclosed (x). Non-disclosure on the sale of land of a fact material to the title of the property, stands on a different footing from non-disclosure of a fact relating to its quality. If the vendor gives particulars of the rents (y), or the rents and business (z) and the vendee says he will trust him and inquires no further, an action will lie; but if the purchaser makes inquiries no action will lie though the particulars be false because he did not rely upon those particulars. Where property was described as "of the estimated annual value of £400" and was worth only £200 a year, it was held that the statement being admittedly not dishonest, the condition entitling the purchaser to compensation for any error or mis-statement in the particulars, did not apply (a). It was pointed out that the purchaser's real complaint was not that the property was not of the "estimated" annual value of £400, but that £400 a year was too high a value. When a purchaser comes to Court for relief he must account for failure to attend to matters of such a kind which are open to observation (b). He is bound to exercise a reasonable degree of caution. Therefore if there be anything in the nature or circumstances of the representations made by the vendor calculated to excite suspicion or to require explanation or investigation, he is put upon his guard and must bear the consequences of his own neglect in not making further investigation. So if a purchaser not satisfied by the representations made by the vendor, takes upon himself to investigate the truth of them and has a full and fair opportunity of testing their accuracy he cannot afterwards say that the investigation made by him was loosely or carelessly made or his solicitor acted in a cursory manner (c). If the misrepresentation

S. 55 is in respect of some fact which is patent, or the truth of which is ascertained by the slightest inquiry, and the purchaser does not choose to inquire, he will be compelled to perform the agreement. Even in these cases, the argument sounds bad in the mouth of the vendor, "I made a representation which was false, and you chose to believe me instead of doubting me and relying upon your own inquiries" (d). Specific performance was decreed, where the sale plan, accurately describing the existing state of the property, would not carry the case higher than a view of the property by the purchaser (e).

Similarly, objection by an auction purchaser, who through carelessness did not choose to inquire about a way round and across a meadow, was not upheld (f). It was not a latent defect. Nor is it a valid objection where land was recommended as well drained, because the purchaser had failed to inquire by whom it was drained, as the draining had to be paid for (g). So a purchaser unacquainted with the locality, purchased a house described as situate in 39, Regency Square, while in fact it was on a street leading from that square to another, specific performance was decreed as the house was well known as 39, Regency Square (h). If a vendor is guilty of concealment, no specific performance would be decreed. Concealment to be fraudulent and material must be a concealment of something that the party concealing was bound to disclose (i). Where there has been concealment of a material fact, though it may not amount to affirmative fraud, and though there has been no eviction, a Court of Equity will grant relief (j). It has never been held that a man is obliged to take a thing with compensation when the thing is substantially and materially different from that, which he was induced by the representations made to him to believe that he bought (k). Specific performance was not decreed when the defence was that the vendor gave no notice of the necessary repair of a wall to protect the estate from the river Thames, which would be an outgoing of £50 per annum (l).

Unless the contrary is stated, contract of sale of land will be deemed to imply that the property is to be sold with vacant possession, so that existing leases or tenancies must be mentioned in the particulars of sale, or in the case of private contract, be referred to in the agreement (m). A purchaser entered into an agreement for the purchase of a property, which he desired to occupy by a particular day, about which the vendor was apprised. The vendor, however, concealed from the purchaser the existence of a lease, which precluded the purchaser from occupying the premises as contemplated by him. In a suit by the purchaser to rescind the contract, it was held that the vendor had been guilty of fraud within the meaning of section 17 of the Indian Contract Act, by actively concealing a fact which was material for the purchaser to know and the purchaser was induced thereby to purchase. The fact that the purchaser by the exercise of ordinary diligence might have ascertained the truth, affords no answer to a suit to recover the purchase-money. Such a case does not fall within the exception to section 19 of the Contract Act (n). A vendor cannot escape liability on the ground that the contract was negotiated through an agent. If an agent, commissioned by a vendor to describe his property and to state the facts and circumstances affecting its value, so as to bind the vendor, makes false statements as to description or value, though not instructed so to do, which the purchaser is led to believe and upon which the purchaser relies, the vendor cannot recover in an action for specific performance. The false statement made by the agent being within his authority, was sufficient to vitiate the contract (o). A vendor knowing of a defect in his title is not entitled either by himself or by his agent to put forward conditions of sale, which are to force upon a purchaser a title which he knew was bad but which he did not disclose (p). The same doctrine applies to India.

A purchaser having been evicted, from a portion of the house under a decree, which had not been disclosed by the vendor, he was held entitled to damages for fraudulent concealment (q). But the law as regards latent defects is different. If the vendor at the time of the contract does not know the existing defect in the estate, the Court will enforce the contract. It would be otherwise if the defect be known to the vendor but which a provident purchaser could not discover (r). There is, however, no duty to disclose an intimation by a tenant that he would leave at the end of the year, the tenant not having given formal notice (s). Nor need the vendor disclose a deed acknowledging that the vendor is not entitled to access of light over the land of a third person (t). There is no such thing known to the law as an inchoate easement and a contract for sale of land with windows overlooking the land of a third party, implies no representation or warranty that the windows are entitled to the access of light over the land or that even the prescriptive period is running. The existence of an agreement, which prevents the statutory period of prescription beginning to run, does not create an encumbrance on the property and the non-disclosure of such an agreement does not invalidate the contract. A clause in such an agreement that the owner of the buildings will block up the windows, is an affirmative covenant only and cannot be enforced against subsequent purchasers under the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay (u). A further clause in such an agreement that the adjoining owner may enter and build up the windows in default of the owner of the buildings doing so, is a mere revocable licence and does not give the adjoining owner any interest in the land, and if it did give such an interest, it would be void as a perpetuity. None of the points mentioned above makes the title too doubtful to be forced upon a purchaser (v).

A landlord's notices to repair containing material facts must be disclosed. On July 31, 1924, defendant purchased from plaintiff two leasehold houses and paid a deposit. Completion was fixed for August 21, 1924. Under the lease the vendors were bound to do the inside and outside repairs. The conditions of sale provided that the purchaser should execute all necessary repairs. In due course requisitions on title were delivered, which included one, asking whether notices from landlords had been served on the property. The answer was that the vendors were not aware of any. This answer, though made in good faith, was not true. In fact the vendors had received landlord's notices on July 7, 1924, calling upon them, within three months of July 4, 1924, to make good the dilapidations found to have accrued on the premises "as per the schedule hereto annexed." The mistake was soon discovered and the vendors on August 20, 1924, sent copies of the notices to the purchaser, who then declined to complete, unless the vendors complied with the notices

S. 55 at their own expense. Condition 6 of the conditions of sale provided that the production of the last receipt for rent should be conclusive evidence that all the covenants had been complied with. Condition 8 provided that if any notices were outstanding, they should be complied with at the expense of the purchaser. Plaintiffs brought an action for specific performance of the contract by defendant. Defendant counter-claimed for the rescission of the contract and the return of his deposit. Held that the notices contained material facts, which it was the duty of the vendors to disclose and that the non-disclosure deprived them of the right to the special relief of specific performance; that neither condition 6 nor condition 8 relieved the vendors from the obligation of disclosing the notices, because the former required the purchaser to assume to be true, that which the vendors knew at the time of the sale to be untrue, and the latter only stated as a contingency, that which the vendors knew to be a fact. Held also that the purchaser having made out no case for the rescission of the contract, it was good at law, and since the purchaser refused to complete according to its terms, he was not entitled to the return of his deposit (w).

Non-disclosure of material defect in title.—A vendor's duty on sale of immovable property is to disclose any material defect in title which is exclusively within his own knowledge and which the purchaser could not be expected to discover for himself with care, ordinarily used in such transaction. If he knowingly suppresses a defect in title, the Court will not allow him to force the title upon a purchaser although in the conditions of sale he has employed general words, large enough to include the defect (x).

Material defects in seller's title.—A condition of sale that "if any error or mis-statement shall appear to have been made in the particulars of sale or these conditions" they shall not annul the sale but compensation will be allowed as may be fixed by a Judge in chambers, does not apply to a defect in title (y). Errors in particulars will not cover a large deficiency, e.g., 573 s. yards for 753 s. yards (z). Conditions of this kind are intended to cover small unintentional errors or inaccuracies (a) unless the party got all he saw (b). The authorities as to compensation conditions are reviewed in Jacobs v. Revell (c). An "error in the description of the property" means misdescription of the corporeal property, not a mistake in the description of the vendor's title (d). There is a presumption against the person suppressing a defective title, where a deed or other evidence is suppressed (e). It was observed by Fry, L. J., that there is a great practical convenience in requiring the vendor who knows his own title, to disclose all that is necessary to protect himself, rather than in requiring the purchaser to demand an inspection of the vendor's title-deeds before entering into a contract, a demand which the owners of property would in some cases be unwilling to concede, and which is not in accordance with the usual course of business in sales by private contract (f). And this rule in Reeve v. Berridge (g) is applicable whether the sale be by private treaty or by public auction (h). The authorities establish that full information should be given to the purchaser. A vendor who desires to limit the rights of a purchaser must do so by explicit and plain conditions : he must tell the truth and all the truth, relevant to the matter in hand. A condition of sale provided that the commencement of title should be an indenture which was a conveyance, not for value, of real and leasehold property on trust for donor for life and then for sale, with power to the donor to revoke the trusts. It was held that the condition was misleading by reason of its not stating the nature of the deed (i). Concealment of defect in title by vendor's solicitor, even though the vendor since the date of the report against the title, put himself in a condition to make a good title, will relieve the purchaser (j). Hence concealment of a decree under which the purchaser was ejected from a portion of the house, was held fraudulent (k). And so with suppression of knowledge. A vendor who owned certain land upon cantonment tenure, knowledge of which was not brought to the notice of the purchaser, entered into a contract to sell the properties held by him, received Rs. 5,000 as earnest money and agreed to get the property transferred to the purchaser's name in the Brigade Major's office in Poona. Notice of the proposed sale having been published, the Cantonment Committee wrote to the purchaser that Government possessed certain rights over the property, upon which the purchaser refused to complete. It was held that the knowledge, that the property was held on cantonment tenure not having been brought to the notice of the purchaser, the Court could not impute such knowledge to him, that the terms of the contract itself were calculated to induce the purchaser to believe, that the vendor was selling not a mere revocable licence to occupy the land, but the land itself and that the purchaser was entitled to the return of his earnest money. It is open to a purchaser claiming specific performance to amend the plaint so as to include a claim for refund of earnest money, and the plaintiff failing to obtain a decree for specific performance should not be driven to bring a separate suit for its recovery, if he is entitled to relief in that form. The circumstance that the purchaser is not entitled to specific performance, is by no means conclusive against his right to the return of his deposit (l). Where the property was in possession of the vendor's mother-in-law who claimed a share, which fact was not disclosed to the purchaser, it was held that the omission to disclose the fact was a material defect in the title (m). A property described in a contract for sale as freehold means unencumbered freehold (n). Non-disclosure, however innocent, will release the purchaser, as where a vendor described property subject to restrictive covenants as freehold (o); or failed to disclose a material and latent defect that the premises were liable to be taken under compulsory acquisition (p); or concealing service of a party wall notice, throwing liability to contribute to costs of party wall works, inasmuch as it would affect the purchase price and constitute a latent defect in the title (q); or that a person in possession claimed a share in the property (r). Where a vendor of immovable property had purchased it from a Hindu widow in possession under a document, purporting to be her husband's will, neither signed nor attested, and on the construction of which, it was doubtful whether she took a widow's estate or an absolute interest, the title was held defective (s). Relief was granted to a purchaser when a

To lot No. 3, the only access was by a carriage sweep opening into the carriage drive of lot No. 2. By error no mention was made of the right of way in the particulars of sale of both lots but on the sale plan, which formed no part of the contract, it was apparent that the only access to lot No. 3 was over the carriage drive. The conditions of sale provided that the sale was subject to all the rights of way and other easements, whether mentioned or not in the particulars, and if any be found not disclosed, such non-disclosure should be deemed to be an omission or error within the meaning of clause 15, whereby it was provided that the sale should not be annulled nor any abatement or compensation allowed, if any error, mis-statement or omission be discovered in the particulars or sale plan. It was held that the vendors were not entitled to specific performance, that there was no patent defect in the title and that the conditions as to errors only applied to errors which were not known to the vendor, that the purchaser was not bound to make a requisition as to the right of way, when the abstract shewed a title to an unencumbered freehold and that the purchaser was entitled to rescind and to a return of the deposit (t). A purchaser was discharged on the ground of undisclosed restrictive stipulation. A vendor had previously orally covenanted with the owner of the adjoining houses not to do anything to prejudice the right of light to the windows of each other's premises and the purchaser had agreed to buy two recently built freehold houses "subject to right of light with owner of the adjoining property being guaranteed." Such a restrictive stipulation was held a defect in title (u). Existence of a restrictive covenant against building within 7½ feet of the boundary, is a material defect entitling purchaser to rescind (v).

On an agreement for sale of an existing lease no purchaser is affected with constructive notice of the covenants in a lease nor is he bound to complete the contract if the lease is subject to onerous covenants of an unusual nature, unless he had a fair opportunity of inspecting the lease before entering into the contract. The rule is the same whether the agreement is to purchase an existing lease or to take an under-lease (w). It is the duty of the vendor to disclose the existence of the covenant to an ignorant purchaser or he must shew that he gave him an opportunity of acquainting himself with the terms of the lease (x). Failure to disclose on a sale of leasehold premises, restrictive covenants in a contract which stated that the lease contained common usual covenants, entitled the purchaser to rescind the contract on his discovering that the lease required all under-leases to be registered, accompanied with a certain fee and contained a power of re-entry in case of breach or non-performance of any of the covenants (y). And where a lease was subject to a covenant, which after restricting certain trades, provided that there should not be carried on the premises "any trade or business or occupation whatsoever whereby any injurious, offensive or disagreeable noise or nuisance shall or may be occasioned, caused or made" it was held that the carrying on of a boys' school would come within prohibition of the covenant and the plaintiff who discovered the covenant after the contract was made, was entitled to rescind (z). So also where the lease contained an unusual covenant such as "not to assign or part with the possession of the premises without the consent of the lessor, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld" (a). It is established that a vendor of leasehold property must disclose the existence of onerous and unusual covenants in the lease or at least afford the purchaser an opportunity of inspecting the leases. Even if "the vendor's title is accepted by the purchaser" the latter will be entitled to rescind, if the vendor has failed to disclose the existence of onerous and unusual covenants before the contract was entered into and of which the purchaser had no notice (b). The condition as to acceptance of the title, did not affect the vendor's general duty of disclosure. On a sale of a reversion, if the vendor had misled the purchaser by a statement that it was subject to a lease containing usual covenants for repairs, etc., the vendor knowing at the same time that there was no person against whom the covenants could be enforced, the Court may refuse specific performance. But where property is sold subject to a lease so described, and tenants are in possession of the property, and pay their rent according to the terms of the lease, and the vendor is not aware, at the time of the contract, of any difficulty in enforcing the covenants, the Court will not refuse to decree specific performance, on the ground that the vendor cannot shew upon whom the liability of the covenants in the lease has devolved. It is not the duty of the vendor to find out and acquaint the purchaser with the name of the party who may be liable on such covenants (c). On a sale by trustees as vendors, they are not bound to disclose the existence of debts which render the sale necessary (d).

Misdescription and misrepresentation.—A misdescription to be a ground for annulment of the sale, must go to the essence of the contract, otherwise the purchaser's remedy is in compensation. A certain cook-room was shewn in the plan as a building intended to be included in the purchase, but which was in fact not included. The purchaser claimed annulment on the ground of error or mis-statement in the particulars. This was refused to him on the ground that, although a house without a cook-room is not much use for the purpose of habitation, yet the nature of the property shewed that the cook-room could be built on the premises, so that the error in the particulars was capable of compensation and that the conditions of sale which provided for any error or mis-statement, if capable of compensation, should not annul the sale nor entitle the purchaser to be discharged, applied (e). Reference may be made to Fawcett v. Holmes (f), where the Court laid down that in each case "the question depends on the view of the Court as to the importance of the misdescription." If a misdescription, although unintentional and not proceeding from fraud, is in a material and substantial point, of such a nature that it may be reasonably supposed, that but for such misdescription, the purchaser would never have entered into a contract for sale, the purchaser is entitled to rescind the contract and recover back his deposit (g). But if the misdescription or defect is not so material as to bring the case within the principle of Flight v. Booth (h), the purchaser is not entitled to have the contract rescinded even if the defect be known to and not disclosed by the vendor (i). So a purchaser was discharged where the conditions of sale incorrectly stated the effect of the trusts of a reversionary interest (j); also where the land offered for sale at an auction, was described as ripe for immediate development, when in fact it could not be used without excavation and filling (k);

S. 55 and where the particulars of sale of a hotel described that the hotel was occupied by a most desirable tenant, while in fact he could scarcely pay the rent and was in arrears for a quarter's rent, while the previous quarter had been paid by instalments and six weeks after the sale he filed his petition, the purchaser was relieved (l); so also when the occupation rent was erroneously stated (m). It would be a ground for annulment if a vendor offers to convey property substantially different from what he offered to sell (n) or where any substantial part of the property turns out to have no existence or cannot be found or the vendor has mala fide given a very exaggerated description of the property (o). And where in the particulars of sale by auction of freehold land, the property was described "as land tax redeemed," but the evidence of redemption was not such as to entitle the vendor to completion of the contract (p), the purchaser was held entitled to the return of his deposit, interest and costs of investigation of title. Misdescription may also be due to failure to disclose existence of easements (q) or that the property was subject to restrictive covenants (r). Where the area is considerably under-stated or over-stated, it would, as affecting the price of the property, be a ground for avoiding the sale altogether (s).

The existence of a scheme of road alignment affecting a property is a material and substantial disadvantage to the property. The non-disclosure amounts to an error or misdescription, but for which, the purchaser would never have made the contract. The purchaser is entitled to the return of earnest money with interest, the case not being one for compensation (t). The existence of the alignment scheme constitutes a defect in title which cannot be cured by compensation (u). The mere fact that the neighbouring properties have been set back is not constructive notice of the alignment scheme (v). On a sale in different lots, each lot is a separate contract, so that, if there is a misrepresentation as to one, giving the purchaser a right to rescind, he cannot repudiate the other, unless the two lots are so connected together or so inter-dependent, that the transaction is in effect one contract (w). Mere contiguity of the lots or the fact that a particular purchaser resolves to purchase two lots because he thinks he can conveniently occupy them together, is not sufficient to make them inter-dependent. Where the conditions provide for errors, mis-statements or omissions and that the same shall not annul the sale nor shall abatement or compensation be allowed or paid by the vendor to the purchaser, such conditions are intended to guard against unintentional errors and do not apply to actual fraud or misrepresentation (x). Here the particulars described the estate to contain 227 acres of a freehold tenure except 50 acres which were of copyhold. The tenure being doubtful, a clause was inserted in the contract that in case the copyhold exceeded 50 acres, no compensation was to be made to the purchaser. The vendor was not required to distinguish which portion was freehold and which copyhold, nor was any compensation to be allowed. The purchaser sent a requisition by which he claimed to have the copyhold and freehold distinguished with a view to compensation. The purchaser afterwards discovered that of the 227 acres 178 acres contained copyhold and 49 freehold and that all the minerals except stone were reserved to the Crown. Held, there was a misdescription of the property and the purchaser had properly objected, and specific performance was refused. The jurisdiction to decree specific performance will not be exercised in favour of a vendor, who has failed to satisfy the Court that he has done all he can to avoid misdescription. If a vendor suggests, that if an opportunity be given to him the representation may be cured, the purchaser does not lose his right to rely upon the misrepresentation and to determine the contract, if the vendor, at the end of the time, fails to make good his suggestion (y). An innocent misrepresentation might justify a purchaser in rescinding the contract, yet if he went on with it he could not recover damages, unless such innocent representation amounted to a warranty forming a contractual part of the bargain (z). A sub-purchaser can take advantage of misrepresentation made by a vendor to a purchaser. Where it was represented that the area of the land was 1,530 acres but the estate consisted of less than 1,100 acres, the sub-purchaser was held entitled to rescind, although one of the articles of the contract provided that the estate as to extent of acreage, should be taken to be conclusively shewn by certain deeds. The Court held that such a condition was merely a conveyancing condition as to identity and coupled with the representation as to acreage, it did not estop the sub-purchaser from rescinding on the ground of deficiency in acreage (a). And where a vendor offered to sell a lease for a certain term when the lessor had the right of option to determine the lease within the time (b) the purchaser was held entitled to return of his deposit with interest. A vendor's assurance that land was burdened with a yearly tenancy when the tenancy was permanent is a misrepresentation (c); so also where a vendor selling a tied public house described it as a free public house in the conditions of sale of the lease of a public house (d). Similarly, a purchaser believing that he was purchasing a long term which turned out to be shorter, is entitled to repudiate (e), but not if the difference between the remaining term and the term stated is insignificant (f).

Where on a sale of leasehold premises described as being held for a term of 23 years and including a yard which was necessary for its enjoyment, it turned out that the yard was not held under the lease, but under a tenancy from year to year at a further rent of £10, and although after the day fixed for completion, the vendors procured a lease, for the same term, of the yard at an additional rent of £8, and offered it to the purchaser, it was held that the defect was not a matter of compensation but one of title and as no title was shewn, the purchaser was entitled to avoid the sale (g). Where an under-lease was described as a lease, the Court considered that although there was a misdescription of the property, there was no such substantial misrepresentation as would entitle the purchaser to repudiate the contract (h). Where again an indefinite representation was made by a vendor, such as property described as nearly freehold turning out to be a leasehold for a long term or freehold turning out to be copyhold the purchaser was held entitled to repudiate the contract (i). Where misrepresentations as to nature and character affecting the value of the property, are made and those representations afterwards turn out to be incorrect and false to the knowledge of the party making them, the foundation is laid for setting aside the contract (j). A slight and immaterial description is of no consequence (k). It is a fatal description entitling the purchaser to rescind, to describe an under-lease as a lease (l); that the property was let to a desirable tenant when the tenant could hardly pay the rent (m); when the land offered for sale was described as "ripe for immediate development" when in fact it was filled with rubbish without excavating which, it could not be used for building purposes (n); that a property situate in a town was "well-supplied with water" when the water was only supplied from a water-works company on payment of water rates, there being no spring or running stream upon the property and the purchaser purchased on the faith of the description in the particulars without knowing the real state of the property (o). And so also failure to disclose the existence of an underground culvert (p) or a public sewer and foot-path likely to interfere with the development of the land (q) or neighbour's right to overhang on part of property (r) sold. Similarly, where the particulars of sale did not mention any peculiarity as to access to the house and the objection was taken as soon as it was known, the purchaser was held entitled to rescind the contract on the principle, that what was presented as the subject-matter of the contract was something different from what must be understood from the description. Here the purchaser of the house, in order to reach it, had to pass through part of another house by way of easement (s). The onus is on the vendor to shew that the purchaser did not rely on the representations made by him and that he was not actually misled. There is no general rule that actual fraud is necessary to induce a Court to rescind a sale. The Court acts on the same principle in rescinding contracts for sale, as in setting aside other contracts and dealings which it considers unconscientious (t). A purchaser agreed to buy an estate upon a statement in the particulars of sale that it lay upon a valuable vein of coal, which vein afterwards proved to have been mostly worked out. Subsequently the purchaser entered into an agreement with a third party to sell the colliery at a price implying the existence of considerable quantity of coal and afterwards discovered the fact of the exhaustion of the coal. Held, reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls, that the plaintiff having failed to shew that his misrepresentation did not influence the defendant to enter into the agreement, the rule of caveat emptor did not apply and that the plaintiff must be left to his remedy at law, if any. Held further that the transaction between the purchaser and the third party did not invalidate the purchaser's defence of misrepresentation to a bill by the vendor for specific performance, though it might have been an answer to a claim by the purchaser for abatement of the purchase-money (u). The existence of a right of way over land which a vendor purports to convey, is a breach of the covenant for good right to convey implied by the use of the words "as beneficial owner." The proper measure of damages in such a case, is the difference between the purchase price and the value of the land as the vendor had power to convey (v). There may, however, be latent defects which though not such as to give the party the right of rescission, may affect the value of the property, giving rise to a claim for compensation on the part of the purchaser. Thus where the vendor knowing of the existence of an underground watercourse, did not disclose it to the purchaser and the purchaser's agent, on inspecting the property prior to the contract, did not see the piping, although it was exposed to view in a hole in the lawn of the house, it was held that the watercourse was not a sewer or drain vested in the local authority nor an easement affecting the property, nor a defect in title but that it was a latent defect in the property although not of such materiality as would prevent the purchaser from getting substantially what she had contracted for, if the contract was specifically enforced against her (w). The principle is that even where there is a latent defect but it is not so material as to bring the case within Flight v. Booth (x), the purchaser is not entitled to have the contract rescinded, even if the defect is known to and not disclosed by the vendor. But where a purchaser bought the land for building purposes which was known to the vendor, who failed to disclose an underground culvert which was a substantial drawback for use of land for building purposes, it was held that the purchaser would not get that for which he had contracted (y). In the former case (z), what the defendant was purchasing and the vendors were offering, was a residential property, with certain specified building advantages, so that notwithstanding the existence of the underground watercourse the defendant would be substantially getting what the plaintiff contracted to give her, viz., a desirable residential property with certain building advantages. In the latter case (a) the purchaser bought the land for building purposes and this was known to the vendors, who represented that it was suitable for building and that there was no restriction as to the class of houses to be erected. Before he entered into the contract the purchaser inspected the property and some time after the contract discovered that there was an underground culvert for water running across the land. There was nothing in the plan shewn to him to indicate the existence of the culvert and the vendors who were trustees of a former owner, were not aware of it. Further, the land was sold subject to the condition, "the property being open for inspection, the purchaser shall be deemed to buy with full knowledge of the actual quantities and conditions thereof. If any error shall be found in the particulars, the same shall not annul the sale, nor shall any compensation be allowed in respect thereof." Where land is contracted to be sold subject to a condition empowering the vendor to rescind the contract in the event of the purchaser making any requisition which the vendor is advised not to comply with, and stipulating that the return of the deposit shall be accepted by the purchaser in discharge of all claims for costs or otherwise, and the Court accedes to an application by the purchaser to be discharged from his contract on the ground of misrepresentation, the vendor cannot avail himself of his power to rescind under the contract; and where the sale is under the direction of the Court, the costs recoverable by the purchaser include, besides the costs of investigating the title and of the application, the costs occasioned by his bidding for and becoming the purchaser of the property (b). Mere puffing up by an auctioneer is to be looked at as a mere flourishing description, and misrepresentation in such cases does not entitle a purchaser to be discharged. Nor is a mere general statement or expression of opinion which the vendor honestly held, a ground for rescission, if it turned out to be false (c); such as the representation that "land is fertile and improvable" whereas part of it was abandoned as useless, cannot, except in extreme cases as, for instance, where a considerable part is covered with water or otherwise irremediable, be considered such a misrepresentation as to entitle a purchaser to be discharged (d); that a house was "substantial and convenient" containing two sitting and five bed-rooms, when the bed-rooms were too small to be used for that purpose (e); that land was "uncommonly rich water-meadow" whereas in fact it was imperfectly watered (f). These are mere expressions of opinion and do not amount to such misrepresentation or misdescription as to vitiate or avoid the sale. So also with indefinite representations of a vendor as that a leasehold was nearly equal to a freehold, being renewable upon a small fine. Such representations ought to put the purchaser on inquiry (g). It is material to observe that it is often fallaciously assumed that a statement of opinion cannot involve the statement of a fact. In a case where the facts are equally well known to both parties, what one of them says to the other is frequently nothing but an expression of opinion; the statement of such an opinion in a sense, is a statement of facts about the condition of the man's own mind, which is irrelevant, for it is of no consequence what the opinion is. But if these facts are not equally known to both sides, then the statement of opinion of one who knows the facts, will involve very often the statement of a material fact, for he impliedly states that he knows facts which justify his opinion.

Purchaser's remedy for misrepresentation.—The remedy of a purchaser whose consent to an agreement has been obtained by misrepresentation is (h) either

- (1) to have the contract declared voidable, for which purpose he has one of the following remedies, namely, compensation, damages, rescission or return of deposit; or
- (2) insist that the contract shall be performed and that he shall be put in the position in which he would have been, if the representation made had been true, the remedy being specific performance.

But the contract is not voidable :

- (1) If the party whose consent was so caused, had the means of discovering the truth with ordinary diligence.
- (2) If the misrepresentation had not caused the consent of the party to whom such misrepresentation was made.

The vendor is not entitled to specific performance, on waiving the part affected by the misrepresentation. The effect of misrepresentation is to destroy the agreement entirely, and to operate as a personal bar against the party who has practised it (i).

How notice of defect affects a purchaser.—Sub-section (1) (a) protects a buyer against defects in the state of the property or the seller's title if he has no notice, actual or constructive, of the defect. If a contract for the sale of land is silent as to the title which is to be shewn by the vendor, the legal implication that the purchaser is entitled to a good title (j) may be rebutted by evidence that before the execution of the contract, the purchaser had notice of the defect in the vendor's title. But if the contract expressly provides that a good title shall be shewn, the purchaser is entitled to insist on a good title, notwithstanding that before the execution of the contract he had notice of defects in the vendor's title (k). If the contract contains no stipulation as to possession being taken by the purchaser before completion and he takes possession with knowledge that there are defects in the title which the vendor cannot remove, the taking of possession amounts to a waiver of the purchaser's right to require the removal of those defects or to repudiate his contract. If, on the other hand, the defects are removable by the vendor, the taking of possession does not amount to such a waiver. A purchaser by making structural alterations to a considerable extent after notice of restrictive covenants, was held to have waived his rights to object to the title on the ground of the restrictions (l). On a purchase of leasehold, it is the duty of the purchaser to inform himself of the covenants of the lease and if he enters and takes possession before doing so, he is bound by those covenants (m). A purchaser of leasehold, who is aware at the time of entering into the contract that the vendor's interest is merely that of an under-lessee, is bound by the contract notwithstanding the misdescription (n). But a purchaser of an under-lease has constructive notice of the provisions of the original lease only when he has had a fair opportunity of ascertaining what they are (o). So also a purchaser of land from one who has purchased it for value without notice, either actual or constructive, of a restrictive covenant, is not bound by the covenant although he himself had notice of it (p). And where the same person is agent both for the vendor and purchaser or is himself vendor and agent for the purchaser, whatever notice he may have, will bind the purchaser (q). It is the duty of the vendor to make his conditions clear and if the vendor's representations preclude the purchaser from making inquiries which he would otherwise have made, the purchaser cannot be fixed with constructive notice of such facts (r).

Where the facts are such as to put the purchaser on inquiry, he is deemed to have had constructive notice of those facts and he is bound by them (s). A recital of a deed is constructive notice of its contents (t), though the deed be inaccurately recited (u), and the most express representation on the part of the vendor or lessor that the deed contains no restrictive covenants or anything to affect the title, will not discharge a purchaser from the consequences of not looking at the deed (v). Nor is a purchaser relieved where the original deed is lost or destroyed and what purported to be a true copy of the instrument lost or destroyed, was subsequently found to be defective in its contents (w) and he will not be heard to say that he §. 55 partially inspected a lease and had no notice of the covenants (x). Occupation of land by a tenant affects the purchaser with constructive notice of the tenant's rights but not of the lessor's title or rights. Actual knowledge by the purchaser that the rents are paid by the tenant to some other person whose receipt is inconsistent with the vendor's title, is constructive notice of that person's rights but mere knowledge that the rents are paid to an estate agent affects the purchaser with no notice at all (y). Where freehold land is sold subject to restrictions contained in or referred to by a specified deed which in turn discloses certain restrictions to which the land is subject as contained in a second deed, a purchaser, who before executing the contract has not inspected either the first or the second deed, will not be granted relief for want of notice, at the time when he entered into the contract, of the restrictions contained in the second deed (z). The absence of a receipt for the consideration in a deed, though it is notice of its non-payment, is not constructive notice of other irregularities in the transaction (a).

Defects discovered after conveyance.—Where the purchaser discovers material defects after the conveyance, he must make out a case of fraud in order to set aside a sale (b). A purchaser sued the vendor on account of deficiency in the actual area of the land from that stated in the sale deed. It was held that the purchaser must make out a fraudulent misrepresentation which he accepted as true, and which induced him to enter into a contract, and which caused him damage (c).

Rescission after conveyance.—In order to warrant rescission, the misrepresentation must amount to actual positive fraud to the same extent as in an action for deceit (d) or the purchaser must prove unfair dealing (e). To set aside a purchase perfected by conveyance and payment of purchase-money, proof of concealment of defect in title by vendor's agent is not sufficient. There must be proof of direct personal knowledge of concealment by the principal (f). A having two parcels and B one parcel of land supposed to contain petroleum, it was agreed by them and C that C should pay them £10,000 if he succeeded in forming a company and inducing such company to pay £13,750 as price of the land, out of which C was to keep £3,750. B, assuming the character of owner, gave to C a conditional promise to sell all land for £13,750, provided the offer was accepted within a certain time. A wrote a letter meant to be shewn to, and which was shewn to, persons intending to form the company, which proved to have influenced them. A and B actively co-operated with C throughout the whole transaction. The company in ignorance of the combination, accepted the proposal, but having discovered the fraud, sued for rescission of the contract. Held, that the contract must be wholly rescinded, price repaid and land reconveyed. Fraud having been established against a party, it is for him if he alleges laches in the other party, to shew when the latter acquired a knowledge of the truth and prove that he knowingly forbore to assert his right (g). A vendor sold and conveyed copyhold as freehold and received the purchase-money. Afterwards the purchaser discovered that the property was really copyhold. The vendor alleged that he made the representation, believing it to be true. Held, assuming that he had made the representation bona fide, the vendor had committed a legal fraud; the sale must be set aside and the purchase-money repaid with interest at 4 per cent. after deducting rents and profits during occupation and the vendor must pay all the expenses which the purchaser had incurred in consequence of the purchase (h).

Where both parties are under a mistake as to a matter of fact.—Section 55 (1) (a) has no application where the contract is fundamentally affected, by both parties to an agreement being under a mistake as to matters of fact, essential to the agreement, for in that case the agreement itself is void (i). Where the defect is unknown both to the vendor and the purchaser, it is not necessary to decide or consider whether the facts over which the parties have been mistaken, constitute non-disclosure of a material defect in the property. The plaintiff, an auction purchaser of property sold at the instance of the Official Receiver, discovered after the sale was held and before the completion, that about half the property was notified by a public body for acquisition and on that ground refused to complete the purchase and demanded the return of the deposit. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to a declaration that the agreement for sale was void and to a return of the deposit (j). In this case the predecessor in office of the vendor, had notice of the intended acquisition and it was argued that the knowledge referred to in section 55 (1) (a) of the Transfer of Property Act was knowledge in fact and not constructive knowledge. The point is further illustrated by illustration (c) to section 20 of the Indian Contract Act. A, being entitled to an estate for the life of B, agrees to sell it to C. B was dead at the time of the agreement but both parties were ignorant of the fact. The agreement is void. But the case is different where through fraud or common mistake or by accident, property is not included in the conveyance or what is not sold is added. In such cases the remedy would be rectification under section 31 of the Specific Relief Act.

Effect of omission to disclose.—Clause 55 (1) (a) has to be read with the last paragraph of section 55 which regards an omission to make such disclosure as fraudulent. It is not open to a purchaser to plead that the vendor failed to discharge his obligation under the section, if he with ordinary care could have discovered the defect in title or if, owing to want of care and wilful abstention from inquiry which he ought to have made, he does not come to know of the defect in title. He is not entitled in such a case to charge the vendor with fraud within the meaning of the last paragraph of section 55 of the Transfer of Property Act. The same result follows if, leaving aside the special provisions of section 55 of the Transfer of Property Act, we consider the section relating to fraud and misrepresentation in the Indian Contract Act. Section 19 contains an exception that if consent be caused by misrepresentation or by silence, which is fraudulent within the meaning of section 17, the contract nevertheless, is not voidable, if the party whose consent was so caused had the means of discovering the truth with ordinary diligence (k). Any omission to disclose a material defect, whether through carelessness or design, is fraudulent. Affirmative fraud is not necessary to entitle a purchaser to relief (l), nor is it competent

S. 55 to a vendor or his agent with knowledge, failing to disclose a material defect, to put forward conditions of sale which are to force a bad title upon his purchaser (m). The same doctrine applies to India when a contract of sale of immovable property implies some warranty as to title by the seller (n). Silence amounts to fraud, for which a Court will grant relief only when it is the non-disclosure of those facts and circumstances which one party is legally bound to communicate to the other. The silence must be the true cause of the change of position of the other party. If a purchaser has allowed the vendors to remain in possession, intending to mislead the plaintiff, who having been misled, has sued them, the decree in the suit would bind the purchaser on the ground of fraud (o). A vendor must produce all documents and must inform the purchaser of all material facts, not apparent on the documents. Whether it would be fraud to offer as good, a title which the vendor knows to be defective in point of law, it is not necessary to determine; but if he knows all and conceals a fact material to the validity of the title, there is no principle on which relief can be refused to a purchaser (p). Again, under the Specific Relief Act sections 17 and 18, the contract for sale is declared not enforceable in favour of a vendor, who knowing himself to have no title to the property has contracted to sell the same and in clause (d) of section 18 it is laid down "when the vendor sues for specific performance of the contract and the suit is dismissed on the ground of imperfect title, the defendant has a right to a return of his deposit with interest and costs."

Right to sue on covenant free from encumbrances.—In an action on a covenant against encumbrance, the plaintiff must allege the facts constituting the disturbance and that the disturbance was lawful, with sufficient particularity, to shew the breach of covenant (q).

In order to justify legal proceedings on this covenant against encumbrances, it is requisite that an actual interruption, claim or demand be made on the purchaser: some hindrance or prevention of enjoyment proved; for the chance alone of his being disturbed and his liability to satisfy claimants or, in other words, the mere existence of outstanding encumbrances, unless they prevent entry and enjoyment as in the case of a prior unexpired lease, will not constitute an immediate breach (r). When the covenant against encumbrance is not an independent covenant but is part of the covenant for quiet enjoyment, the covenantor does not mean to guarantee that the estate was free from encumbrances. The mere existence of an encumbrance does not give a right to sue under this covenant.

Clause (1), Sub-clause (b) : Disclosure by Seller.

Root of title.—In India there is no rule, as in England, that a purchaser cannot call for title beyond a particular number of years (s). This is not practicable in view of the time limit on actions on mortgages and the provisions in the Statute of Limitations, which in certain events and under certain circumstances give a fresh starting point of limitation. In the absence of any circumstances casting a doubt on title, a 12-year possessory title in the vendor may be regarded as safe.

A vendor cannot, however, force a title on a purchaser with an indemnity. The ground of the English rule, that a purchaser cannot call for a title for more than 60 years, is not that 60 years made a good title, but that it raised an inference on which the Court would act that there was nothing to disturb the title. This did not preclude a purchaser from calling for a long title if the vendor had one, but only that a purchaser could not demand a longer title if the vendor had no better (t). On a reference to Devsi Ghela v. Jivaraj Mukundas (u) it appears that in two previous cases, the Bombay High Court held that a purchaser could not require more than 20 years' title. The decision in that case was founded on the agreement between the parties that no other title should be required than that appearing in the documents mentioned therein. Where it is provided by conditions of sale of land that the vendor shall not be bound to shew any title prior to an instrument of a certain date, the purchaser may insist upon a defect of title appearing aliunde and before that date, and, if it be proved to exist, may rescind the contract and recover back earnest money, interest and expenses (v). The purchaser must bear the costs of obtaining certified copies of all orders and consent decrees asked for in his requisitions (w). So also certified copies of wills, Probates and Letters of Administration, the vendor is neither bound to deliver nor pay for. The above documents are not title-deeds. Even a mortgage is not a muniment of title.

Title-deeds.—It is not solely incumbent upon the vendor to move by tendering the abstract. It is also incumbent upon the purchaser to ask for it (x). Certified copies of documents and decrees or orders of the Court, probates and Letters of Administration are not title-deeds. It is the duty of the seller to render to the buyer all facilities for investigation of title. He must, therefore, produce all deeds relating to the property which are in his possession or in the possession of one from whom he is in a position to procure. The seller is bound to produce documents of title only when the purchaser asks for them (y). Under the Act the seller is obliged to give inspection to the buyer on demand of all documents of title relating to the property, not only such as may be in his possession but also those which are in his power to produce, such as may be with his agent, solicitor or mortgagee. Usually the matter of giving and taking inspection of title-deeds is provided for by the contract for sale itself. In general practice, the seller's solicitor hands the title-deeds over to the buyer's solicitor, on the latter undertaking to return the same on demand without claiming any lien for his costs or otherwise. In the absence of any stipulation, it is the duty of the buyer to go to the seller's place or such reasonable place as he may appoint, including his solicitor's office, to inspect the title-deeds. The costs of such inspection must be borne by the purchaser. In England, however, the rule is to deliver to the buyer an abstract of title. It would obviously be unwise for the seller to deliver his title-deeds to the buyer or his solicitor unconditionally, for in case of dispute between them, their recovery might entail not only cost and trouble but perhaps litigation. The seller must clear the title at his own expense (z). It is his duty to be ready with his title before he carries the property to market.

Abstract of title.—On completing the agreement for sale, the seller delivers to the buyer an abstract of title. In India on sales by auction, a condition for delivery of the abstract is inserted. Usually time for delivery of the abstract is not of the

S. 55 essence of the contract, though it may be made such by express stipulation between the parties, by reason of the nature of the property or by surrounding circumstances shewing an intention on the part of the parties to complete the contract within a limited time. In considering the question whether, in the absence of any of these circumstances, time is to be considered as the essence of the contract in delivering the abstract, the Court looks at the substance and not the mere form of the contract (a). The vendor must bear the expense of abstracting a deed forming part of the title required by law, although such deed be not in his possession (b). In India the practice of delivering an abstract of title does not obtain (c).

As to what is a proper abstract is a question of degree and where a purchaser objects that the abstract is insufficient, it lies upon him to show how it is imperfect (d). By the expression "perfect abstract" is meant the most perfect abstract in the vendor's possession, actual or constructive, at the time of delivery. For a vendor, who has a good title, would not be permitted fraudulently to deliver an imperfect abstract to which objections would necessarily be taken, and upon these objections being taken, avail himself of his own fraud to avoid his contract (e). A perfect abstract of title should contain, with sufficient fullness, the effect of every instrument which constitutes the title of the vendor and it should contain further a statement of all the facts necessary to deduce a title in the vendor (f). An abstract though deficient in length of title, is sufficient if it contains a full and fair statement of all muniments which the vendor has in his possession, power or knowledge and contains a fair statement of the deduction of his title (g). Every document that forms a link in the vendor's title, ought to be abstracted in chief and also the deed which is recited in the subsequent deed (h). Where the title-deeds are to be produced by a certain day, if they are not then ready, the purchaser cannot object to the delay, if he receives them afterwards without objection (i). A vendor is bound, on delivering an abstract, to make out such a title as he undertook to shew or as a purchaser was bound to accept (j). The practice of setting in an abstract, deeds to be executed which were not so, is both inconvenient and improper (k). The title is first shewn when the abstract states all the matters which, if proved, make a good title. A title is made when the matters are proved. A purchaser is entitled to call for inspection of any deed not abstracted, which relates to the property and is in possession of the vendor. As to missing documents, a good title was made when proof was produced of search for them and their loss (l). A vendor is not justified in suppressing an equitable encumbrance, although satisfied, but it may not be necessary that that should appear upon the abstract (m).

Computation of limitation.—One of the conditions in a sale by auction is that the purchaser shall, within a specified number of days after the actual delivery of the abstract, deliver, at a given address of the office of the vendor's attorney, a statement in writing of his objections and requisitions (if any) to or on the title, as deduced by such abstract to and in respect of the description of the property and upon the expiration of such last mentioned time (and in this respect time is to be deemed of the essence of the contract) the title shall be considered as approved of and accepted by the purchaser, subject only to such objections and requisitions, if any. Under such a stipulation the time within which a purchaser would be barred, dates from the delivery of a perfect abstract and not an abstract which shews a perfect title (which is entirely a different thing) but an abstract which sufficiently shews all documents and gives all the facts upon which such title, as the vendor is professing, is based (n).

Recitals no evidence.—Recitals in a deed are, strictly speaking, evidence only against the parties to the deed and those claiming through or under them. A mortgage was effected on the property in favour of two joint mortgagees, by an agreement of charge duly registered and the deposit of title-deeds with the mortgagees. To deduce a good title, it was necessary to prove that the mortgage had been discharged. As proof of discharge, the vendor produced a certified copy of a release executed by only one of the joint mortgagees, which recited the death of the other mortgagee and that the co-mortgagee was his sole heir. It was held that the recitals in the release were not evidence against the joint mortgagee and the title contracted for had not been deduced (o). In Bombay, solicitors have adopted the practice of accepting recitals in deeds over 20 years old in the same way as is done in England, under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (p).

Covenant to produce.—A purchaser is not bound to complete his purchase without the title-deeds unless he has a legal covenant to produce them. A covenant to produce title-deeds runs with the land for the benefit of the purchasers but not for the benefit of the vendors (q).

Loss of sale deed before registration.—If a deed of sale for value more than Rs. 100, is lost before registration, the purchaser can bring a suit against the vendor to compel execution and registration of a fresh deed. If the vendor has resold and delivered possession after the execution of the lost deed to another who has notice of the sale to the plaintiff, the latter is entitled as against the subsequent purchaser to a decree for possession of the property (r).

Conveyance destroyed by fire before registration.—Where a conveyance compulsorily registrable under section 17 of the Registration Act, XVI of 1908, is destroyed by fire before registration, the purchaser can sue the vendor for a fresh deed to the same effect. In such a case secondary evidence of the contents is admissible (s).

Unstamped title-deeds.—Where a title-deed is unstamped or insufficiently stamped which being a link in the chain, is necessary for the protection of the title, the purchaser is entitled to insist upon the document being stamped at the vendor's expense. Where a mortgage deed was insufficiently stamped the purchaser could compel the vendor to stamp it before completion with a full ad valorem duty at the vendor's expense notwithstanding the mortgagee had consented to join in the conveyance (t). The Court is not entitled to speculate whether the purchaser may or may not have occasion to use the deed. A purchaser is entitled to have every deed forming a step in his title in such a shape that he can, if he needs it, give it in evidence. But a purchaser has no such right when the deed is unnecessary for the protection of his title and the defect can be cured by the concurrence of the parties to the unstamped deed (u). Under section 35 of the Stamp Act of 1899 no instrument chargeable with duty shall be admitted in evidence for any purpose unless such instrument is duly stamped (v). Consequently such a document is regarded as non-existent.

Delivery of abstract.—It was observed in Oakden v. Pike (w) that an abstract was delivered whenever a number of sheets of paper, call it what you will, is delivered to the purchaser, which contains with sufficient clearness and sufficient fullness the effect of every instrument, which constitutes part of the title of the vendor, and that is the delivery of the abstract even though it takes place before actual comparison of the abstract with the deeds themselves, which they purport to abstract. The vendor by sending that, announces to the purchaser that those are the documents which he is ready to shew him at any time whenever he wishes to see them, either at his place of residence or any place of business that may be arranged.

Deducing a title.—It was observed in Oakden v. Pike (x) that “it is inappropriate to use the word deduce as expressing either delivery of the abstract or the shewing of the deeds. The deducing the title—the proper use of that expression is this :—“I deduce my title from my great-grandfather ; I do not deduce my title by sending the title nor do I deduce my title by shewing you the deeds. By sending you the abstract and shewing you the deeds, I shew you how I deduce my title. According to the strict meaning of the words, ‘deducing the title’ is stating from whom or from what source the party draws forth his title.”

Commissioners’ report.—Exceptions are allowed on the Registrar’s holding that the sale conferred a good title (y).

Clause (1), Sub-clause (c) : Answers to Buyer’s Requisitions.

The seller’s title.—There is no express provision in the Act as to the nature of the title which a seller must offer to the buyer. The duty cast upon the seller is to disclose to the buyer any material defect in his title, of which the buyer is not aware and which he could not with ordinary care discover. It cannot be said that when the title-deeds are handed over to the buyer or a complete abstract given to him, any defect which could be discovered from the title-deeds or from the abstract, is a defect that would come within the purview of sub-section 55 (1) (a). The title which a vendor must shew must be a title in himself or in those whom he has a legal or equitable right to require to join in the conveyance ; he has no right to say that some other person is willing to enter into a contract, and so force the title of that other person on the purchaser (z). It is his duty to make out a title to the whole and not a part only of the property (a). If a purchaser is entitled at all to insist, that the vendors having only a partial interest, makes the contract void, he must insist upon the objection at once and cannot avail himself of it after having treated the contract as good and required the concurrence of the persons who can complete the title (b). In the absence of a contract, providing that the plaintiff should shew only such title as he could give or some other special contract as to title, the general law laid down in section 25 of the Specific Relief Act, I of 1877, must prevail (c). Generally, the title which the seller is expected to make is stipulated between the parties. In an open contract, however, when nothing is said on either side, it is the duty of the seller to make out a title which the Court could force upon an unwilling purchaser, for which purpose it must be a marketable title free from reasonable doubts.

In Pyrke v. Waddingham (d) the question was whether the vendor had shewn such a title as the Court would compel the purchaser to accept. The Vice-Chancellor, although his opinion was in favour of the title, thought that that opinion was not based upon any general rule of law or upon reasonings so conclusive as to satisfy the Court that other competent persons might not entertain a different opinion or that the purchaser taking the title might not be exposed to substantial and not merely idle litigation. He refused to decree specific performance and proceeded to lay down certain principles, as follows :—

- (1) A doubtful title which a purchaser will not be compelled to accept, is not only a title upon which the Court entertains doubts, but includes also a title, which although the Court has a favourable opinion of it, yet may reasonably and fairly be questioned in the opinion of other competent persons ; for the Court has no means of binding the question as against adverse claimants, or of indemnifying the purchaser, if its own opinion in favour of the title should turn out not to be well founded. No standard can be laid down as to the nature and amount of doubt which would justify a purchaser from completing the sale. The difficulty of this subject is further enhanced by the conflict of judicial decisions and opinions.
- (2) If the doubts as to a title arise upon a question connected with the general law, the Court is to judge whether the general law on the point is or is not settled ; and if it be not, or if the doubts as to the title be affected by extrinsic circumstances, which neither the purchaser nor the Court can satisfactorily investigate, specific performance will be refused.
- (3) The rule rests upon the principle that every purchaser is entitled to require a marketable title.
- (4) It is the duty of the Court, on questions of title depending on the possibility of future rights arising, to consider the course which would be taken if the rights had actually arisen, and were in course of litigation.
- (5) A marketable title is a title, which at all times, and under all circumstances, may be forced upon an unwilling purchaser.

The decision was disapproved, and not followed where the facts were similar (e). Still the principle has been approved of (f).

“A marketable title” is the same as a “title free from reasonable doubts.” Often “marketable title” is used with or without the addition of the words “free from reasonable doubt.” It means a title which the Court will at all times and in all circumstances force on an unwilling purchaser (g). It is a title to which an honest purchaser could not reasonably raise any objection and which in turn would enable him to thrust the property on any buyer, however unwilling, from him. In the absence of a contract to the contrary fiduciary owners should make out a marketable title free from reasonable doubt. So also in case of an open contract, the vendor must make out a marketable title (h). Where doubt is thrown upon a title owing to strangers making claims, their truth or falsehood may only be ascertained by litigation between those strangers and the vendor, and that doubt cannot be resolved in a suit for specific performance. In determining whether the title is doubtful, the state of facts existing at the time the suit was brought, must be considered. When the question between vendor and purchaser is whether the title is good, bad or doubtful, it is for the Court to decide to which category the title is to be assigned; and when there is reasonable probability that forcing it on the purchaser will involve him in litigation, the Court ought not, in the exercise of its discretion, to force it on an unwilling purchaser. No title offered by the head of a joint Hindu family or a family in which, whether in fact joint or not, claims are put forward by members to the property as ancestral, could be good enough to be forced on an unwilling purchaser, unless all the coparceners concurred (i). The possibility of a reasonable dispute as to the construction of a will (j) or a right of renewal under a lease (k) are also instances. A good or sufficient title is such a title as a Court of Chancery would adopt as a sufficient ground for compelling specific performance, and by a stipulation for good title must be understood, not such a title as would support a verdict for the purchaser in an action of ejectment against a mere stranger, but such a one as would enable the purchaser to hold the property against any person who might probably challenge his right to it (l). A condition in an agreement for sale of freehold provided for a marketable title, but on investigation it was discovered that the houses were a part of a property, sold by a building society subject to contingent restrictive covenants which were admitted to make the title not marketable. It was held that the purchaser was right in declining to proceed with the sale and was entitled to recover back his deposit (m). Here the vendor adduced evidence that the purchaser knew of the restrictions at the time of the contract, but the evidence was held inadmissible to modify the terms of the express contract. But where a vendor sells such title as he has or has to convey under an agreement of compromise of doubtful rights, he is not bound to deduce any title to the property (n). A condition of sale that the purchaser shall take such title as the vendor can give, implies possession of some title in the vendor, however defective it might be (o). A purchaser is not bound under an express agreement to give a good title, to pay the purchase-money until such a title is made out by the vendor and he is ready to convey (p). If a contract for sale is silent as to the title, the legal implication that the purchaser is entitled to a good title, may be rebutted by evidence that, before the execution of the contract, the purchaser had notice of defects in the vendor's title. But, if the contract expressly provides that a good title shall be shewn, the purchaser is entitled to insist on a good title, notwithstanding that before the execution of the contract, he had notice of defects in the vendor's title. If the purchaser before completion, takes possession with knowledge that there are defects in the title, which the vendor cannot remove, the taking of possession amounts to a waiver of the purchaser's right to require the removal of those defects, or to repudiate his contract. If, on the other hand, the defects are removable by the vendor, the taking of possession does not amount to such a waiver (q). Indirect evidence is admissible on investigation of title, in case of death, by production of probate or Letters of Administration, and in the case of mortgage by deposit of title-deeds or equitable charge, by the fact that the documents creating the charge are in possession of the debtor (r). A declaration inserted in the testing clause of a deed which purports to affect or qualify any other provisions in the body of the deed, has no legal effect (s). The record of rights is no evidence on the question of title (t). A kobala containing a clause to the effect that if it be subsequently found that the vendors had no title to the properties sold, then certain other properties of theirs shall be counted as sold, creates or declares a right in the latter properties, though in future, vested or contingent, in favour of the vendees and coming, as such, under section 17 (1) (b) of the Registration Act, it is registrable at a registration office within the jurisdiction of which, some of the latter properties are situated (u).

Contracts for sale of property are upon condition frequently expressed but always implied, that the vendor has a good title; if he has not, the purchaser is entitled to no satisfaction; the return of the deposit with interest and costs is all that the purchaser can expect (v). The right to a good title does not grow out of the agreement between the parties but is given by law; but a purchaser may waive his right by going on with the agreement, after he has full notice that he is not to expect a good title. This is, in such case, a matter of notice and not contract (w). If a vendor of leasehold interest means to sell it without producing his lessor's title, he ought to declare it (x). Independently of the question of merger, a party selling is taken, prima facie, to do so free from encumbrances (y). A purchaser is not bound to accept an indemnity for a contingent encumbrance, however small the amount or remote the contingency, but is entitled to have it discharged (z). A vendor must use all reasonable diligence to make a good title and he will not be relieved of this duty by a Court, without the consent of the purchaser, even though he should offer to discharge the purchaser from the contract (a). It is his duty to make a title to the whole property and not to a part only (b). When the sale is of two distinct lots which adjoin and which would be more conveniently occupied together, a purchaser is not obliged to purchase, unless a good title to both is made out (c). Here the inducement was to possess one as an appendage to the other and so the purchaser should not be compelled to purchase one alone. Otherwise a purchaser of two lots is not justified in refusing to perform his contract for the purchase of one lot because a good title to the other lot is not made out (d). When property is encumbered, the question of encumbrance is a question of conveyance but not of title (e). It is no objection to a title upon a sale by auction that a memorandum appears amongst the title-deeds, shewing that a former owner of the property (under

S. 55 whom the vendor derives title) had raised money thereunder by way of equitable mortgage, and that there is no evidence that such charge had been released, other than that afforded by the vendor's possession of the deeds and memorandum (f). Where the title is derived through a mortgagee who conveyed the property to the vendor, the mortgagee's title not being absolute against the creditors of the mortgagor, and there being no proof of the debts being satisfied and the mortgagor dying intestate and without heirs, and any of the creditors might obtain administration to the estate and redeem the mortgage, it cannot be said that a good title was shewn (g). If a deed of gift to a person, under whom the vendor claims by purchase for value, forms a link in the title, a purchaser is not entitled to repudiate the contract (h). But he may do so if the voluntary conveyance was the commencement of the title and the title was not of sufficient length of time. Such an omission on the part of the vendor, viz., to state that the title commenced with a voluntary conveyance, renders the condition of sale a misleading one (i). The existence of a restrictive covenant makes the property of less value and is a fatal objection to title if it has not been disclosed (j) unless the restrictive covenants could be disregarded as being necessarily inoperative. So where it was practically impossible that gas works should be erected, a covenant not to erect them might be disregarded (k).

Purchaser's right to investigate lessor's title.—On a sale of leasehold property, a purchaser is bound to assume the lease duly granted (l) and has no right to ask the vendor to make out a title to the reversion, whether such reversion be freehold or leasehold. This is the law in England both under section 2 of the Vendor and Purchaser's Act, 1874, 37 and 38 Vict., c. 78, and the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, 44 and 45 Vict., c. 41, sec. 3 (1).

Leasehold conveyed as freehold.—The Act makes no distinction between freehold and leasehold for the purpose of the law embodied in section 8 of the Act (m). Where, however, by mistake of the draftsman a leasehold has been conveyed as freehold, it is advisable to rectify the instrument by executing an assignment of the term. The covenants in an assignment of leasehold differ from those on a grant of freehold but the lessee would nevertheless be liable for such of the covenants as run with the land, assuming him to have notice of the leasehold character of the property. A lease obtained from Government is exempt under section 3 of the Indian Stamp Act, 1899, from stamp duty not only in the first instance but in the case of subsequent transfers as well.

Marketable title to the satisfaction of the purchaser's solicitors.—As to what a vendor should prove, when the purchaser refuses to perform his contract, containing a stipulation that the vendor shall make out a marketable title to the satisfaction of the purchaser's solicitors, was considered by the Bombay High Court when it was held, that a vendor has to establish, when he desires to enforce such a contract either (a) that the solicitors did approve of the title, or (b) that there was such a title tendered as made it unreasonable not to approve of it (n).

Possessory title.—Where a vendor contracts to give a title commencing with a certain instrument and it afterwards appears that he cannot give such a title but can give a good possessory title from a later date, the possessory title which accrued after the date of the contract under the Statute of Limitation, was forced upon the purchaser (o). A title founded upon possession of but a few years, is the weakest possible legal title. In re. Baker & Selmon's Contract (p), the title was forced on the purchaser though it was very different from that for which he bargained. The principle in such cases is that the vendor has fulfilled his contract of sale. The conditions of sale bind the parties and if the vendor has undertaken to give a title of a particular type and the good title which he offers is not of that type, the purchaser cannot be compelled to accept it, because it is not that which contractually the vendor has undertaken to give. An experienced conveyancer may say it is in reality as valuable and as sound a title, but the purchaser has a right to say, "I do not take anybody's advice. I contracted for one type of title and no Court can make me take one which does not comply with the description in the contract" (q). Offering a possessory title is no fulfilment of contract for an absolute title (r).

Leasehold title.—On a sale of leasehold there is an implied undertaking by the seller (if the contrary be not expressed) to make out the lessor's title to demise; and because the residue of the term is short, the value of the property small, and the absence of any premium for the lease, there is no inference that the purchaser intended to waive his right to call for the production of the lessor's title (s). And when an agreement for lease contains an option to purchase the premises by the lessee, his rights are those of an ordinary purchaser to have a good title made out and the onus is on the vendor to shew that the purchaser had waived his right to have a good title made out (t). On a sale of a lease the vendor must also shew that he has a valid title to the lease or to the term granted by the lease. Likewise, in case of an agreement to lease, the vendor is bound to shew that there is a subsisting valid agreement to lease (u). Where a lease contained a provision reserving to the lessee "option of purchasing all the estate, interest and title which is at the date of these presents vested in the landlords in and to the freehold premises hereby demised and the fixtures and fittings at a price not exceeding £3,000," it was held that the tenant's rights were only to acquire for £3,000 the actual interest in the premises and therefore the landlords were under no obligation to pay off the mortgage and convey the unencumbered fee simple in consideration of the purchase price of £3,000 (v). The purchaser of a leasehold may object to the vendor's title if he has incurred a forfeiture, although it does not appear that the lessor has taken advantage of the forfeiture (w). On a purchase of an under-lease, it is not a valid objection to the title that the under-lease may become forfeited by the non-performance of the covenants in the original lease (x). The purchaser must have known, before the contract, that the under-lease was liable to be forfeited by a breach of the covenants contained in the original lease. It is because of this very evil that a contract to assign a lease is not satisfied by granting or assigning an under-lease. A purchaser entered into an open contract to purchase a "leasehold" house and paid a deposit. It appeared from the abstract of title that the property was held upon an under-lease. The purchaser objected to the title on the ground that the property being so held, she would be liable to eviction by the original lessor for breaches of covenant in respect of property not comprised in the under-lease. Held, applying the doctrine of Darlington v. Hamilton (y), followed in Creswell v. Davidson (z), that a good title had not been shewn and that the purchaser was entitled to a return of the deposit (a). Assignor of a lease who by non-compliance with a dilapidation notice served by the landlord has incurred forfeiture, cannot make a good title under an open contract although the assignee has tendered and the landlord has accepted rent subsequently to the date of the contract but before completion had been effected (b). Where property is described as held under a lease which actually proves to be an under-lease, the purchaser cannot be compelled to accept the title (c). Such a description is fatal to the title (d). A contract to lease is not satisfied by granting an under-lease but if the purchaser had knowledge, he would be prevented from setting up misdescription as an objection to title (e). Where an agreement was made to sell "all his interest in the lease" it was held that the purchaser could not refuse to complete on the ground that the title proved to be an under-lease for a term less by three days than the term granted by the original lease (f). If a property is subject to easements, a purchaser is not compelled to take the title (g). It is a formidable objection to the vendor's title, on a sale of leaseholds, that the vendor has underlet the premises with the covenants contained in the original lease omitted, for example, covenants to build or to paint at certain periods, for by doing so, the vendor puts it out of his power during the under-lease to enforce performance of covenants, for breach of which the original lessor can re-enter (h).

Seller with an imperfect title.—Section 18 of the Specific Relief Act, I of 1877, enacts that where a person contracts to sell certain property, having only an imperfect title thereto, the purchaser (except as otherwise provided by Chapter II of the said Act) has the following rights:—

- (a) If the vendor has subsequently to the sale acquired any interest in the property, the purchaser may compel him to make good the contract out of such interest;
- (b) where the concurrence of other persons is necessary to validate the title, and they are bound to convey at the vendor's request, the purchaser may compel him to procure such concurrence;
- (c) where the vendor professes to sell unencumbered property but the property is mortgaged for an amount not exceeding the purchase-money, and the vendor has in fact only a right to redeem it, the purchaser may compel him to redeem the mortgage and to obtain a conveyance from the mortgagee;
- (d) where the vendor sues for specific performance of the contract, and the suit is dismissed on the ground of his imperfect title, the defendant has a right to the return of his deposit (if any) with interest thereon, to his costs of the suit, and to a lien for such deposit, interest and costs on the interest of the vendor in the property agreed to be sold.

Seller with no title.—A contract for the sale of immoveable property cannot be specifically enforced in favour of a vendor (i),

- (a) who, knowing himself not to have any title to the property, has contracted to sell the same (j),
- (b) who, though he entered into the contract believing that he had a good title to the property cannot, at the time fixed by the parties or by the Court for the completion of the sale, give the purchaser a title free from reasonable doubt (k),
- (c) who, previous to entering into the contract, has made a settlement (though not founded on any valuable consideration) of the subject-matter of the contract (l).

Whether or not specific performance ought to be granted.—The species of doubt which prevents a Court from enforcing specific performance must come within one of the three divisions. First, when there has been a decision adverse to the title or to the principle on which the title depends, which the Court is of opinion is wrong (of course, if the Court is of opinion that the decision is right, it is simply a bad title) in which case, the Court will not rely upon its own opinion against the decision already pronounced and will not enforce the title. Another case is where there is a decision in favour of the title but the Court is of opinion that the decision was not right. The third division is where there is a known difficulty in the title. To this may be added a fourth case, where validity of the title depends upon facts or a fact, the exact accuracy of which there are no means of judging (m). The authorities establish the following propositions :

- (a) The Court will not compel a person to take a doubtful title but if in its opinion, upon a due consideration of the law, the title is good, the Court is bound so to hold (n).
- (b) A title depending upon the establishment of complicated facts of an ambiguous nature and which is exposed to being challenged with reasonable chance of success, cannot be forced on a purchaser (o).
- (c) A purchaser is not compelled to accept a title formerly subject to encumbrances, the discharge of which is shown only by presumption (p).
- (d) Where title to an estate has been pronounced bad by any Judge of the Court, the Court of Appeal will not, except upon the clearest ground and under very special circumstances, force it upon the purchaser (q).
- (e) Where a vendor contracts to give a title commencing with a certain instrument and it afterwards appears he cannot give such a title, but can give a good possessory title from a later date, the possessory title will be forced upon the purchaser (r).

- (f) Where property was described as business premises but a covenant imposed serious restrictions, excluding the very user of the premises for the purpose of business, the Court refused to force the title on the purchaser (s).
- (g) Upon a sale of a public house to a brewery company, on the lessor's refusal to the assignment on the ground that the house should remain a free house, the title could not be forced on the unwilling purchaser (t).

Searching interrogatory.—A purchaser made the following requisitions, "Is there, to the knowledge of the vendors or their solicitors, any settlement, deed, fact, omission or any encumbrance affecting the property not disclosed by the abstract?" The reply was, "We invariably decline to answer questions of this description." The requisition being pressed, the reply was returned, "The vendors will reply if required, but they have no knowledge of the contents of the abstract." A summons was taken out by the purchaser for an order on the vendor and their solicitors to answer this inquiry. Adhering to his decision in Re. Solomon & Davey (u), Hall, V. C., ordered that the vendors' solicitors must make a full and complete answer to the requisition. On appeal the order was reversed and it was held that neither the vendors nor their solicitors were bound to answer any part of the requisition (v). Such a question is no requisition. A vendor is not bound to answer such a general inquiry (w). It is a searching interrogatory put to the vendors and their solicitors. Some solicitors answer the requisition in this manner, "not that we are aware of but the purchaser's solicitors should make the usual searches." In India this practice is generally prevalent. Sometimes answers are given. Some conveyancers refuse to answer, their reason being that answering such a requisition might subject them to personal liability to the purchaser. The practice is of modern growth and there seems to be a tendency to discourage it. Sometimes the reply is evaded by an answer, "no requisition can be administered to the vendor's solicitors." In this connection it must be pointed out that clause 55 (1) (c) makes it incumbent upon the vendor to answer to the best of his information only relevant questions put to him in respect of the property or the title thereto. In India there is no judicial authority in favour of such a requisition.

Deeds collateral to the title.—A purchaser is not entitled to call for deeds collateral to the title (x).

Agreement not to require an abstract.—A purchaser who agrees not to require an abstract of title has nevertheless a right to inspect the deeds which constitute the vendor's title (y).

Objection to be made within a given time.—In a condition of sale where objections are to be sent to the vendor's title within a given time, time is of the essence of the contract; and where delivery of abstract is to be made within a specified time and the vendor fails to do so, the purchaser has a right to repudiate the purchase. On the other hand, if the vendor has complied with the conditions of delivering the abstract within a specified time and if the purchaser does not deliver his objections or if he does deliver his objections, and if there be any objection not contained in what are so sent in, but afterwards thought of, such objections are considered as waived and the title to that extent accepted (z). If the purchaser retains the abstract for five months, making no objections to the title but simply requires the vendor to verify the abstract with the title-deeds, he is deemed to have accepted the title (a). Time to deliver requisitions does not run until a perfect abstract is delivered (b). If the abstract be incomplete, it is not a delivery of the abstract (c). Purchaser is not entitled to use information derived from the abstract for his own advantage adversely to the vendor (d).

Time for answering requisitions.—When a requisition is made by a purchaser, reasonable time must be allowed to the vendor to answer it. In this case the requisition involved the necessity of filing a suit and obtaining a decree and the vendor consented to comply with it (e).

The vendor's usual rescission clause.—Frequently conditions of sale contain stipulations with regard to title, that in case a purchaser shall within a certain time, make any objection to or requisition on the title which the vendor shall be unable or unwilling to remove or comply with, the vendor shall be at liberty, notwithstanding any attempt to remove or comply with such objection or requisition by notice in writing to be given to the purchaser or his solicitor, to annul the contract and return to the purchaser his deposit without interest, costs or other compensation. To say that a vendor upon a condition of this description could annul a contract brevi manu, without attempting to answer any of the requisitions which are made on the part of the purchaser, would be opposed both to principle and authority; for that would, in truth, be giving to the vendor the power of saying that that which was intended as a sale, and was a sale, shall, in truth, be no sale at all. The vendor's right of rescission must be co-extensive with the purchaser's right to object to the title under the same condition. Such a condition in a sale ought to be discouraged and ought not to receive a construction oppressive on the purchaser. A condition of this nature reserves to the vendor the right to rescind the contract for sale, upon his discovering that a purchaser insists or persists in a requisition which he is unable or unwilling to remove or comply with (f). Where there is a right to give notice to rescind, there must be an objection to title, unwillingness on the part of the vendor to remove that objection, communication of that unwillingness, and insistence on the part of the purchaser notwithstanding the communication (g). The vendor is not bound to exercise the right immediately, time not being of the essence, but may do so within a reasonable time (h); nor need such notice give the purchaser a period of time within which to waive his requisitions (i). The rescission must be by notice in writing to the purchaser after the requisition is made, or having given an answer, the purchaser considers it to be unsatisfactory and says, "I press this requisition." The right on the part of the vendor to rescind arises at once and there is no further locus pœnitentiæ allowed to the purchaser. In other words, where once the insistence is shewn by the purchaser, the vendor is not bound to intimate to him that if he goes on persisting or insisting, the power will be exercised adversely to him (j). Therefore, the right to rescind arises immediately the objection or requisition is persisted in. To hold otherwise would be to add a new term to the contract. If there be litigation pending, the vendor may rescind before judgment (k), but not after judgment (l). Another point which is clearly established is that on a condition of this kind, the reason need not be stated by the vendor (m). Still there are limitations put upon his power.

A vendor has certain duties to perform which he cannot get rid of by such conditions of sale. He is bound to answer and give the purchaser an opportunity to waive or insist upon a requisition (n). For although the contract is in terms that the vendor may rescind if "unwilling" to comply with the requisition, this does not give him the right to rescind arbitrarily or capriciously (o), for example, if the vendor rescinds with a view to sell the property to a third person (p) or on the ground of expense in obtaining the Court's sanction (q). In re. Dames and Wood (r) the Court of Appeal had this kind of condition under consideration and there are dicta of the learned Judges there, which tend to shew that, in the opinion of the Court, the vendor cannot avail himself of such a condition arbitrarily or unless he shews some reasonable ground for his unwillingness to answer the requisitions. The right must be exercised in good faith (s). The right, however, is lost if the vendor answers the requisition (t), but this risk is guarded by insertion of the words, "notwithstanding any previous negotiation or attempt to remove or comply with" be at liberty on giving to the purchaser not less than a stipulated day's notice in writing to annul the sale. The operation of this condition is often suspended by a clause being added to the effect, that if the purchaser within a specified number of days after receiving the notice from the vendor to rescind, withdraws his objection or requisition, the notice to rescind shall also be withdrawn by the vendor. As to deposit, it is usual to provide that the purchaser shall be entitled to its return without interest, costs or compensation. If, however, there is no stipulation, the vendor must pay the costs of the purchaser of investigating the title and of any litigation undertaken by him, if his action was reasonable (u). The clause does not oust the jurisdiction of the Court to order purchaser's costs of the litigation pending at the date of rescission, notwithstanding a provision in the clause, that the vendor should on rescission return to the purchaser his deposit but without interest, costs or compensation (v). Under this condition, if the purchaser refuses to accept an indemnity offered by the vendor, the refusal in itself is not "a reasonable ground" for rescission and a notice of rescission signed "without prejudice" is void (w). Again, where the purchaser is discharged by the Court on the ground of misdescription, the vendor cannot avail himself of this condition (x). A vendor is not disentitled to exercise this power for having made a statement on the faith of a promise by a third party, that he will concur in the sale, without having previously made an agreement with that third party binding him to do so. Such a statement is not reckless (y). Where trustees were unable to make a title in that capacity but offered to convey as legal personal representatives, which course the purchaser declined to accept, it was held that the vendors could exercise the right to rescind (z). Continuance of the treaty after the first objection of the purchaser is a waiver of the condition as to rescission (a).

Repudiation after acceptance of title.—Where a title has been accepted as marketable and where payment of a portion of the purchase-money has been made, a subsequent discovery before completion, that the title was not marketable, does not prevent the purchaser from repudiating the contract, where he has proceeded on an erroneous advice of his solicitors (b).

"Falsa demonstratio non nocet."—When there is an error in the description of the principal thing, though there was no error in the addition, nothing passes, but when the first description is true, a false addition does not vitiate the grant (c). If the grant, however, be of a particular thing, a mistaken or false addition will not restrict or modify it; but it is otherwise when the grant is in general terms (d). "Falsa demonstratio non nocet" is one of the established rules of construction. It means, that if there be an adequate and sufficient description, with convenient certainty of what was meant to pass, a subsequent erroneous addition will not vitiate it. The characteristic of cases within the rule is, that the description, so far as it is false, applies to no subject at all: and so far as it is true, applies to one only (e). The doctrine is not to be confined to cases where the first part of the description is true and the latter untrue, it being immaterial on what part of the description the falsa demonstratio occurs (f), whether the true description precedes the false or vice versa. But if the words form an essential or material part of the description of the subject-matter of the agreement, they cannot be rejected as falsa demonstratio (g). When in a grant, the description of the parcels is made up of more than one part, and one part is true and the other false, then if the part which is true describes the subject with sufficient accuracy, the untrue part will be rejected as a falsa demonstratio, and will not vitiate the grant (h). A person in possession of two contiguous estates, M. and P., sold the former to respondents in 1872 and a survey was made on behalf of both to ascertain the boundary between the two estates and thereafter the respondents occupied M. In 1881 P. was sold to the appellant. In 1896 the latter commenced proceedings to establish that the respondents were occupying a part of the P. estate. On measurements, the aggregate of the plots of land mentioned in the deeds as forming part of M. was found to be less than the land actually occupied by the respondents. It was held that the measurements in the deeds did not affect the title of the respondents to the land included in the conveyance to them as determined by contemporary survey (i). If the description of the property defines with sufficient certainty what is conveyed, inaccuracy of dimensions or of plans will not vitiate what is sufficiently defined. The dimensions are not an addition to what is sufficiently described but are part and parcel of the description itself. So that if property be sold as standing on a piece of land which it fully covers, a mistake in the area, whereby the property is mentioned as larger than it actually is, will not entitle the purchaser to any relief. Hence where a leading description is followed

S. 55 by a supplementary description which does not exhaust all the particulars, then the entirety, which has been expressly and definitely given, shall not be prejudiced by an imperfect and inaccurate enumeration of the particulars (j). Government agreed to convey to the plaintiff a plot of land of certain area. The plot was measured by survey officers and boundaries fixed by stone marks. In the conveyance the boundaries were loosely described and the plan annexed to it inaccurately shewed the area to be much higher than that agreed to be conveyed. It was held that the plan having been proved to be inaccurate, it must be treated as a mere falsa demonstratio (k). An inaccuracy in the boundary is not enough to exclude what is not so bounded, if it appears from the evidence to have been a part of the property dealt with and the previous description of the property is sufficient to include it (l). On a conveyance of land "bounded by the seashore" the word seashore in its strict legal sense means the land situate between medium, high and low water marks (m). Where land was described as of freehold tenure but a strip was found to be of copyhold tenure and this portion was between the freehold and one of the described boundaries, the strip would pass under the general words (n). The words of the conveyance, taken in connection with the map which is referred to and made part of it, are sufficient to describe the land in question and to express an intention to convey it. The omission to describe the land by the name of "muckland" and even the description of it as within another denomination, amounts at most to an erroneous additional description of that which is identified beyond doubt by reference to the map constat de corpore (o). There is no efficacy in them (p).

Waiver of purchaser's right to investigate the title.—The mere fact of taking possession does not amount to a waiver of the right to call for the vendor's title (q) though generally it amounts to a waiver of objection to title (r). Prima facie taking possession after delivery of abstract and not in pursuance of any term in the contract, amounts to a waiver of the objections appearing on the abstract (s). Possession was in this instance taken by the purchaser's tenant. In entering into possession, the purchaser proceeds upon the supposition that the contract will be executed and therefore he agrees from that day that he will treat it as if it was executed (t). If, however, the possession be taken pursuant to the contract for sale, it does not amount to waiver of the vendor's title (u). Where the abstract was not to be delivered until demanded by the purchaser, who took possession and for two years made no demand for the abstract, it was held that the purchaser was to be taken to have accepted the title and was not entitled to have it investigated (v). A long possession without objection to title and vexatious objections to complete the purchase, amount to acceptance of title (w). If, however, possession be taken with the permission of the vendor pending answer to certain requisitions, which were subsequently to be answered satisfactorily, and afterwards possession was
